CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now it is proposed, as I understand, on the part of the committee, to appropriate $150,000 more to pay them a second time for this property.

Mr. McMILLAN. We propose to buy this property if we can get it for the sum named, if this board of engineers after an examination shall report in favor of it.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to ask the Senator if it would not be, under all the circumstances of the case, exact equity on the part of this Government needing this property for a great public benefit to commerce and the navigation of the lakes to take this property?

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would it not be exact equity to take the property by some act of public condemnation, taking into consideration the benefit the company has already received by reason of the land grant, and instead of appropriating $150,000 deduct what they have already received from the value of the canal?

Mr. McMILLAN. It would be rather an unusual course for the Government after having given to the State of Wisconsin a grant of land to say that because she granted it to a private corporation therefore we will take the property from the private corporation. That would be rather unusual.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Government had granted this land direct.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Government granted to the State of Wisconsin 200,000 acres of land for the construction of this canal and harbor of refuge, deeming it to be of such great importance to the commerce of the country.

Mr. McPHERSON. Did the Government expect that, when the grant of 200,000 acres was made for this special purpose, this harbor of refuge would be subjected to tolls by everybody who used it?

Mr. McMILLAN. Of course it must have contemplated all that followed. The State of Wisconsin granted the land to this company.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if it was not in the original act of Congress that when the State was reimbursed, then the whole thing was to be free. Was this grant to the State for the purpose of enabling the State to speculate off the commerce of the country? I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fifth section of the act making the land grant, which says:

> And whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal, with such interest, the said State shall be allowed to tax for the use of said canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

That was clearly the intention, that it should become a free canal as soon as the State was reimbursed out of these lands and out of the tolls.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Government subsequently extended that grant without any provision of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Merely extended the time, subject to all the provisions of the grant.

Mr. McMILLAN. It granted it to the State of Wisconsin and gave the State of Wisconsin the power to dispose of the lands. If the State of Wisconsin has granted to this company rights which are vested, I suppose they can not be divested without compensation.

The great difficulty is here that Senators do not remember that this appropriation is not for the benefit of this canal company. We do not intend to protect them or to advance their interests in any way. We wish to divest them of property which they have got into their hands, through which they burden the commerce of the country, through which they levy toll; and we can not relieve ourselves of the burden unless we take this property in some way.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand that the General Government gave to the State of Wisconsin 200,000 acres of land in trust for a certain purpose; that when that purpose was accomplished and the lands were sold for sufficient to cover the cost then the harbor of refuge should be free. Now, what I want to know is whether the State of Wisconsin has abused the terms and conditions of the trust. What right had the State of Wisconsin to give to a private corporation the power to prevent the condition made by the General Government originally in the grant of land to the State of Wisconsin being carried out?

Mr. McMILLAN. In the accounts of this company, as they are furnished by this report, the total cost of the Sturgeon Bay Canal, including interest on advances made by stockholders to December 1, 1882, and expenses incurred in managing the canal to October 10, 1882, is $642,615.57; deducting all the receipts which they have given here for the whole, the balance is $178,168.58, which they still need to make up the expense of the construction of the canal.

If Senators will refer to page 17 of Executive Document No. 34, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, they will see this. I think it is very evident that Senators have not examined with accuracy and care these things for want of time. It can not be expected that they could observe all this information by merely looking at the report; none of us can do that. This statement shows the claims of this company.

We are not, as I said, considering the interests of this company. We want to get rid of it in some way, to get it out of the way, so that the commerce of the lakes may be free; and the easiest way, as we apprehend, is to get this property into the possession of the United States by a purchase of this kind. Evidently these tolls are sufficient to make it profitable to the company; and to go, even in the most favorable aspect which could be considered, into a system of litigation for the purpose of ascertaining the accounts of this company, whether they have been kept right or not, would be a course of proceeding which the Government of the United States can not carry on successfully; but if we can purchase this improvement, which is shown to be a profitable one, for this appropriation, after an examination which shall report it reasonable by agents of the Government itself, then we submit that the appropriation is a proper one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not know that what I have to say will be of any interest to anybody, and there is not anybody here worth speaking of; still it is a duty to explore this thing and find out just what it is.

If you ever sailed along the beautiful shores of Green Bay, Mr. President, much north of its southern end at the head of the bay, you would find yourself in a magnificent territory of timber land, and if you go up the peninsula which lies between Green Bay and Lake Michigan you would find that it is not a country of great population, but it is a country of vast timber resources. You would find that Sturgeon Bay and Sturgeon River were a kind of slough, that almost connects Green Bay with Lake Michigan about midway the length of Green Bay. You would find from this report that the total amount of canal built was a little over a mile. By the engineer's plan on a large scale it is 6,000 feet, but as stated in the letter-press somewhere it is something over 7,000 feet; that is the canal. The thing that that canal was designed to do, and ninety-nine one hundredths of the thing that it has done, was to furnish facilities to the timber-men to get out their timber and lumber; and when you turn to the statistics of the vessels going in and the vessels going out, you will find that there is a large lack of information as to the voyages that those vessels were making. It says "freight and passenger steamers," fifteen or twenty, in the only year that we have any statistics about at all. Every one of those might have been freight and passenger steamers that were going in to haul out tugs, or to haul out rafts or haul out scows, or to carry in provisions to the lumbermen; probably some have gone through the canal. But these statistics as showing that there is the commerce of the great lakes, which my friend from Michigan so eloquently described as making use of this canal, are entirely delusive. Every time that a tug went in to haul out a raft or a stick of timber it was entered up to the account of a vessel entering; and every time it went out, as it might do twenty-five times a day, it is represented as a vessel going out. You might as well count the number of rats that go in and come out of their holes in an old barn as to count up these vessels in the way these statistics do. It does not give us any information at all. Such is the canal and such is the commerce.

Now, let us look a little at the state of things. We have not any information, statistical or official or any other kind except what will be given here in debate, in respect of this affair and its operations since the report of the Secretary of War on the 19th of December, 1882, which in round numbers and for all practical purposes is four years ago—long enough time to have a whole four years of reform administration—I mean of this canal—the only reform administration I know of.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will permit me to suggest that is one reason why this board of engineers has still to examine this and report on the propriety of the appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; I see. We are in such haste to commit ourselves to this business for a canal—and the canal will not be worth a dollar after the timber is out, in my humble opinion—that we can not wait to get any information now within four years, but we are to submit $150,000 of the money of the people to the disposition of the Secretary of War to purchase this property if his three engineers are satisfied that it ought to be purchased, and take upon ourselves the burden of keeping this up, and then if is not wanted any more it can be dropped.

This corporation is a concern with which we have nothing to do in a legal way. We dealt with the State of Wisconsin, and we dealt with nobody else. We did not authorize her to build this work through the agency of a corporation by name. We authorized her to receive 200,000 acres of land, which she did do, and required her in consideration of that to do four things, four important things in respect of the consideration for her money. The first was she was to build a breakwater in Lake Michigan to protect the entrance of this canal, so that in a hard storm or any storm a vessel that would wish to get in there would be able to get in, which can not be done without a breakwater except by the merest chance, as everybody knows. The act of Congress therefore required that a breakwater should be built—"to aid the State of Wisconsin in the construction of a breakwater." That was one thing.

The State of Wisconsin, second, was to construct a harbor. She was then to construct a canal—the third thing. The canal having thus been constructed, and the breakwater constructed, and the harbor constructed, Wisconsin was authorized to take tolls on vessels using the canal, not taking shelter in the harbor of refuge, not taking shelter behind the breakwater, but to charge tolls for the use of the canal. She was bound to build these two most important works, if we are to take the opinion of gentlemen, and to keep them up herself.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the act granting 200,000 acres of land?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the act granting the 200,000 acres of land. Neither of these things has been done. The State of Wisconsin, if she keeps her faith with us, is bound to do them now except that by a convenient and unnoticed act, which is said to have the effect of relieving her to that extent, Congress has undertaken to do the work on the harbor of refuge by a later act, so that the State of Wisconsin is out from any sound obligations in regard to the harbor of refuge. It has not yet occurred to her people, and to the Committee on Commerce, or both, that the United States, if we did not have this canal and these works, should build the breakwater; but that was an oversight which will have to be looked to hereafter.

In the next place, therefore, the breakwater being built and the harbor of refuge being built in consideration of this grant, the right of vessels to have the benefit of those two things was not to be taxable with tolls at all. The only right granted to her to take tolls was on the canal, as I said before. Having taken these tolls sufficient to reimburse, together with the land grant, for her necessary expenses about this business, then she was bound to reduce those tolls to just enough to pay the expense of keeping up the work and no more. That was a part of the consideration. That is now to be turned off upon the United States. That is the way it stands.

It is said we can not ask the company to do this sort of thing, because it is a company of Wisconsin, and if she has granted vested rights, they can not be taken away; but let us see what the State of Wisconsin did do. This is her act:

SECTION 1. That the lands, franchises, rights, powers, and privileges granted to and conferred upon the State of Wisconsin by an act of Congress approved April 10, 1866, "granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon Bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan, in said State," be, and the same are hereby, accepted, with the restrictions and upon the terms and condition contained in said act of Congress.

The State of Wisconsin, therefore, committed her public faith to doing all the things and observing all the conditions that Congress had imposed upon the grant, and she felt justified in doing it because the 200,000 acres of land that Congress had given to her was adequate for the purpose. Then section 2 of the act of Wisconsin from which I am reading provides:

SEC. 2. For the purpose [of] carrying out the objects of said act, the said lands are hereby granted and conferred upon the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal and Harbor Company, a company organized in the city of Milwaukee on the 4th day of October, 1866, under and by virtue of chapter 365 of the laws of Wisconsin of 1864, approved April 24, 1864, subject to all the conditions, restrictions, and obligations herein mentioned.

Some of those that are "herein mentioned" are those that I have read of doing those three things, the harbor, the breakwater, and the building of the canal, the keeping it up, and reducing the tolls and the cost of keeping it up when they should have been reimbursed. That was the plan. Now, when you turn over to the report of receipts and expenses you will find some rather curious things.

Mr. BUTLER. What did they receive for the land?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will come to that in a minute. On page 11 of Executive Document No. 34, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, statement D is:

Cash receipts from May 7, 1872, to October 10, 1882.

They did not begin to build the canal until May, 1872. The grant expired and Congress renewed it, and then they began. They got in from stockholders cash subscriptions and sales $2,665. That was the total stock subscription. They got in besides (which would amount to the same thing), on cash loans which were finally paid with stock at par, $58,983.34, making a total for the capital stock of the company of $61,648.34. They got in "from trespasses on the land grant and sales of dead and down timber, being collections by timber clerks and assistants," the sum of $53,042.95, being for mere trespasses, timber that was taken off they got pay for, within $8,000 of the capital stock that was paid in in any form. They realized from the sale of the land grant—and whether the directors and operators of this concern bought the lands at any price they could fix with the Wisconsin State board, which it is sometimes said is done by rings and arrangements, I do not know—but they acknowledge to have received from the sale of the land grant patented to the canal company, the State did not sell the lands; they were patented direct to the company, so that they could sell them to their directors, and scoop in the concern as the phrase is—I do not know that they did, but I have heard that in New England and some such places they do—$324,922.27 from the sale of the lands granted. That makes, adding the money got from the timber trespasses, $53,042.95, $378,000 and a little over (I have not footed it up) from the land grant alone.

Then here comes an item of great interest in the way expenses are to be put up as a basis of the United States buying things afterward. They issued bonds it seems. They had to borrow money on bonds to build this mile and a quarter of canal. They issued $8,000 of bonds and sold them in New York at 90 cents on the dollar, and when you turn over to page 13 you find the expense of selling the $8,000 of bonds, and if the President of the Senate were in the chair, having been Secretary of the Treasury, I should like to know if he was able to do as well in selling public securities:

Bond expense account:

Paid M. L. Scudder, jr., financial agent and trustee, expenses and services as financial agent and trustee for bondholders	$4,250 00
Paid Sinnot & Meyer, attorneys, New York, preparing first mortgage land-grant bonds	$1,511 55
Paid for lithographing and engraving bonds and maps, printing pamphlet, and advertising bonds for sale	797 70

Making a total for disposing of $8,000 of bonds, $6,559.25.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the net balance?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The net balance would be $1,440.75. Then when you take off the 10 per cent. they lost on the discount, which is not in this statement, this being a mere expense account, they would get about $1,000—a pretty good commercial transaction! But, of course, all that will be made good if we only pass this amendment.

When we come down to the end of this thing, when these people are willing to sell out, we find this state of affairs, that they do not owe anybody. There is no allegation or pretense in these papers, and certainly none in this amendment, of any suspicion of any outstanding mortgage, so that $8,000 has been paid as stated. They have got their property to all appearances, if there is not any underground business about it, clear of any mortgage or incumbrance or any debt, and on the 1st of October, 1882, when they made up this statement for the purpose of selling out for $178,000, they had got their property clear of debt and had cash on hand $22,161.86.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any expense account in that document stating the cost of construction?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, there are lots of very interesting things here, but knowing that all Senators are financiers, I thought that $8,000 bond expense account would be a good item to present.

Saying nothing now about the honor and duty of the State of Wisconsin to keep up this work and build the rest of it, we find that this company has got of stock and cash paid in on stock $61,000. That is in, according to this statement, and that is all. We find that they have got cash on hand $22,000 in round numbers. They have got the work, and they have got a few little fragments of land left which I will not say anything about, because they are small, not worth taking any great account of. That is their situation. With only a paid-in stock of $61,000, on which 6 per cent. would be only $3,600 a year in round numbers, and the expense of the people necessary to keep such a canal a mile and a quarter long in order, you have got therefore only to realize to pay a fair dividend on the stock $3,600 a year, and to pay the necessary expense of keeping it up; however little or much that may be I do not know. That is what they undertook to do.

So as the matter now stands the property is paid for, and paid for by the United States, except the sum that is paid in on the stock of $60,000, and of that they had in 1882 $22,000 on hand apparently that they could have divided the next day. The obligation of the State of Wisconsin still is to build a breakwater, to make this harbor of refuge at the entrance to the canal of any account for any purpose that is necessary to use it. That is unperformed. You have got the duty to build the harbor of refuge unperformed by any fair construction. But, as I said before, the United States has been induced, without knowing it apparently, to undertake to make appropriations, probably in a river and harbor bill like this, for building a harbor of refuge at Sturgeon Bay, which the State of Wisconsin solemnly undertook to do, and we have not heard any statistics about this business, I repeat, for four years. And that is the condition of this company, its capital, and its property. My friend from Minnesota said that they were $178,000 out of pocket. Where did they get the money if they did not borrow it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The statement on page 11——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it perfectly, but I repeat that my friend from Minnesota is mistaken. It is impossible unless there is an outstanding debt, and there is no pretense that there is an outstanding debt of any kind.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will find the statement there made up of items that are printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the statement and it means just this: that running over their expense account which has been paid by them with only that amount of stock paid in as they state themselves out of these assets got from the sales of the land and the timber and the tolls down to the time this report was made, they are in a condition where their canal property as they say is worth $178,000. The way they figure up what it has cost is by compounding interest and charging the most enormous sums for general service, incidental expenses, and all that sort of thing; but I repeat it is mathematically impossible, unless behind and yet not known there is a debt, which the purchaser of this property will be liable for as the owner of it, to be paid. Their $178,000 is a piece of book-keeping to show what they consider the canal to be worth. It is not anything else.

Now, if after four years of no information and no reports the Senate of the United States desires to go into this speculation, my duty will have been done. If it does not do any good here, as I am rather afraid it will not, I hope it may do some good in the future somewhere.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has alluded to the fact that the original bonded indebtedness of this corporation was about $60,000. It will be interesting to know, I think, where that $60,000 went, and at the risk of trespassing somewhat on the indulgence of the Senate and infringing on its patience I will call attention to the statement made on page 18 of this report on which the president of this canal corporation endeavors to make a statement showing of what items the $178,000 of their indebtedness is made up. This letter is dated the 18th day of November, 1882, and in the charges making up the balance of $642,615.57, the cost of the canal to December 1, 1882, is stated as follows:

The par value of four hundred and fifty-six shares—

That is, at $100, $45,600, leaving about $14,000 of the entire amount of $60,000 outstanding to come somewhere else—

The par value of four hundred and fifty-six shares ($45,600) of full-paid stock, four hundred and fifty shares of which ($45,000) were issued September 9, 1872, to the officers and directors, by a vote of the board, for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to that date.

The canal company was chartered in 1866. They did not commence work until July 9, 1874, I think.

Mr. McMILLAN. Eighteen hundred and seventy-two.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me see about that.

On the 9th of July, 1872, work was begun on the canal, and the first quarter was completed November, 1874.

The Senator from Minnesota is right.

Mr. GEORGE. When was the stock voted?

Mr. INGALLS. The date of the letter is November 18, 1882. It must have been prior to that. He gives the items of the cost of the canal to December 1, 1882, and the first item is:

Cash advances made by stockholders in 1872 and 1873, with interest to December 1, 1882, as per schedule herewith forwarded.

That is to say, prior to the commencement of the work upon this canal the stockholders had advanced an amount which with interest to December 1, 1882, ten years afterward—the rate of interest not being stated—amounted to $140,383.58. Of course the principal and interest advanced by them must have been reimbursed out of the funds derived in some way, and yet this $140,000 is presented in this statement of the 18th day of November, 1882, as one of the principal items making up the indebtedness of $178,000 mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota as the excess of expenditure over and above the amount received from the sales of the lands granted by Congress.

The second item, as I have said, showing where $45,000 of this $60,000 of stock went to, shows that $45,000 of it was deliberately stolen, for there is no other name to give it under heaven or among men. There is no other description to make of it except larceny. Before this work was commenced this board of directors met together and proceeded to vote themselves for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to the time when the canal was commenced $45,000. And the Senator from Minnesota quotes that as an honest item in the aggregate of expenditures which have been made by this corporation in excess of the money that they received from the sales of the lands granted to them by the Government of the United States. But this is not all.

There was voted—

For services during the construction of the canal	$300
To the chief engineer, paid for in cash	100
To Joseph Harris, paid for in cash	100
To C. D. Robinson, paid for in cash	100

Making $600 more that was paid to these officers out of the six shares of stock in excess of the $45,000 that the president and directors voted themselves. That was "but one half-pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" as Prince Henry said about Falstaff's case. For actual services rendered by the engineer and others who had been actually engaged in doing the work on the survey of this canal, $600; to the officers and directors who had been engaged in manipulating this transaction $45,000, for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to that date!

This is the statement of honest expenditures incurred over and above what they received from the amount of these lands that the Senator from Minnesota regales us with in order to convince the Senate that we shall make a good bargain by paying these men $150,000 for a work which the statistics show they have been paid for over and above every legitimate outlay by the sums received from the sale of the 200,000 acres of valuable pine lands, of which, by the way, it appears from the statement of this board no public record was kept or could be found to show the parties to whom they were sold or the money that was received for their disposition, so that they were left solely in estimating what was received from the sale of the 200,000 acres of land to an estimate based upon supposition as to what the value was of surrounding land. I will read from page 7 of the report, signed by Houston——

Mr. GEORGE. Is there nothing on the books of the company to show what the land sold for?

Mr. INGALLS. This report is signed by D. C. Houston, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, brevet colonel; Henry M. Robert, major of engineers, and addressed to Brig. Gen. H. G. Wright, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, they having been directed to examine into the details of this transaction.

The governor, in reply—

That is to say, section 5 of the act of Congress making the grant required the Legislature of Wisconsin to cause to be kept an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands granted, and the board applied to the governor of Wisconsin for a copy of this record—

The governor, in reply, informed the board that the canal was built by the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal and Harbor Company, and that there is no public record of what the company realized for the land grant.

A very singular aspect of affairs! A very convenient method of keeping accounts! The act of Congress making the grant required the Legislature to keep an account of the land grant and the net proceeds of it, and when the board applied to the governor for a copy of the record that ought to have been kept under the act of Congress they were informed that the canal was not built by the State of Wisconsin, that it was constructed by the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal Company, and there was no public record whatever of what the company realized from the land grant.

There being no other source of information on this point, the board, on the 14th of July, 1882, applied to the president of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal and Harbor Company, and, under date of October 10, was informed that their total receipts from the land grant of 200,000 acres were (see Statement D, hereto appended) $377,965.22, and the total expenses of the land department were $33,278.05, leaving $344,687.17 as the net sum realized from the land grant on the 10th of October, 1882.

The most valuable pine lands in the peninsula of Wisconsin, sought after no doubt with avidity by hundreds of speculators, and the very fact that there was an absolute failure on the part of this company and of the Legislature of Wisconsin to require of the company a compliance with the plain provision of the act of Congress making the grant, is pretty conclusive ground for a presumption at least that the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal and Harbor Company did not report their receipts anything over the actual fact.

Mr. BUTLER. Fifty-odd thousand dollars were received from trespasses and sales of timber.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can not hear the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. INGALLS. When it appears, as it does upon page 11 of this report, as has already been read by the Senator from Vermont, that from trespasses and sales of dead and down timber alone on this land they admitted that they received $53,042.95, which is 25 or 30 cents an acre on the average just simply for the windfalls and the dead and down timber, I think it is a tolerably fair presumption that a dollar and a quarter an acre for the land and all the rest of the timber that remained on it was, to say the least, not an entirely inadequate compensation.

But this is not all of the statement of how this $178,000 is made up. After the board of directors had voted this $45,000 in cash, and the engineers and the men who did the work $600 in cash, they go on to make a still further computation, and they say that——

A fair and reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the president, treasurer, and assistant secretary, and book-keeper, from September 9, 1872, to December 9, 1882, a period of ten years and three months—

Ought to be allowed. They had not previously made any charge for their services. That is shown by their report; but when they wanted to fill up the full measure of their claim on the Government and make an estimate of what they ought to charge over and above what they had received they cast about them for items; and so they say that the president and treasurer and assistant secretary ought to have compensation, not having charged it hitherto, from September 9, 1872, to December 9, 1882, a period of ten years and three months, amounting for the president to the modest sum of $10,250. They did not count interest on that. Then to the treasurer and assistant secretary $1,000 a year, they having previously paid $6,250—$4,000 more; and to the book-keeper $2,562.50, making a grand total of these items that are built up absolutely out of moonshine and fraud, the merest jugglery and caprice of book-keeping never thought of until they wanted to make up an account against the Government of the United States—they foot up a grand total of $202,796.08. The Senator from Minnesota informs us that in addition to the amount that they have received from this land in excess of the amount expended for the canal we ought to pay them $150,000 more, because they built up this simulated and fabricated account of moneys paid to themselves.

"Get money," says the drama. "Get money, honestly if thou canst, but get money." These navigators of the Northwest, these promoters of canal-boat enterprises who never began this work until they had succeeded in inducing Congress six years after they allowed it to lapse to make an appropriation for building a harbor of refuge at one end of it, have evidently obeyed the injunction of the drama, "Put money in thy purse." They are a thrifty set; and were it not for the traces and indications visible in the way in which this bill has been builded up here, the means by which it is being promoted and supported, I should be surprised that the chairman of a committee as important as the Committee on Commerce in this body should say that he had established through these items the foundation for a claim for the payment out of the Treasury of the United States of $150,000 in liquidation of sums like these.

But we have not yet got through entirely with the mysterious features of this transaction. They were not satisfied with voting themselves bonds and charging it to the construction account; they were not satisfied with charging for salaries that they never expected to claim; but on pages 14, 15, and 16 they have occupied I do not know how many lines in a statement of compound interest upon the sums of money that were advanced by these stockholders to themselves. I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate in reading it.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the rate of interest charged?

Mr. INGALLS. It varies. Here is July 5, 1875, 7 per cent.; July 31, 1876, 7 per cent.; February 12, 1876, interest on account Henry Seibert & Brother, New York, lithographing and engraving bonds, maps, &c., $721.50. That they did not pay until a year and a half after it was due. After getting $1,600 out of an issue of $8,000 bonds, they did not pay the account for lithographing the bonds for a year and six months, and they charged on that interest at 7 per cent. making $75.75, thereby still further diminishing this diminutive and microscopic result to that bond transaction. June 1, 1876, the interest began to be larger. Apparently the credit of the company had suffered somewhat by their delay. It ran up to 10 per cent. In 1874, 1873, and 1875 all the items are computed at 10 per cent. June 3, 1876, interest on note to Green, Fox & Howard, contractors, they allowed at 7 per cent. That is followed by interest on various loans from national banks in New York and elsewhere and notes given to contractors. Interest to Green Bay Dredge and Pile-Driver Company, on past-due payment, 8 per cent.; and so on down through 1875 to 1881, making a total interest account of $10,151.26, which is to be added to all these other items which go to make up this account against the Government of the United States.

Not only do they charge interest, but they charge discount on their own paper. They charge up to swell this account by the worthlessness of their own paper in the market and demand that anybody who takes this canal shall bring it up to par.

January 1, 1875. Discount on eight bonds of $1,000 each, taken at 90 cents, or 10 per cent. discount, by O. B. Green, Fox & Howard, contractors, $800.

That is an item of the expense account. When their credit was so low that they had to pay their own contractors in bonds, and their bonds were only worth 90 cents on the dollar, they come in and charge the Government the deficiency. To make it up to 100 cents on a dollar they charge the Government the difference between the value of their own bonds on the market and their par value. And so on down through a large number of items bearing on this bond transaction aggregating $12,974.32, which is certified to be correct, without date, in Statement E, by Jesse Spalding, the president, and William E. Strong, assistant secretary and treasurer of the association. The Senator from Minnesota stated with some heat, I thought, that this was not an attempt by an insolvent corporation to sell their property to the Government. I should think not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I said what it was, if the Senator will remember, that it was a purchase in the interest of the commerce and navigation of the country, and not in the interest of this company at all, with no regard to their wishes.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understood. I was about to say a company that exhibited such shining and brilliant capacity in the way of fabricating accounts never would become insolvent if book-keeping would protect it. They will always be safe in their books; they will always have a good balance to show, no matter what their assets may be.

But the Senator states now in qualification of his prior narration, that this is simply a desire on the part of the United States Government to take possession of this property against the will of this corporation. Let us see what is said about that. Evidently this matter had been talked about; it had been the subject of deliberation; because in this report of Mr. John Nader, who was the agent for the State inspector of canals, from which extracts have hitherto been read, he states expressly:

The canal company can have no serious, or in fact any, objection to the change suggested above—

That is to say, the taking possession of the property by the Government—for, having completed the work according to law, it has no further pecuniary interest.

The statement of the State inspector of canals and of the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, do not harmonize. There is not any indisposition manifested on the part of the canal company to sell this property, and I venture to say that if the corporation which constructed this little canal, a mile and a quarter or a mile and a half long, were opposing it, this amendment never would have been presented here.

I can only speak of the matter so far as my inspection of this transaction has proceeded. The Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from New York have rebuked us for presuming to say anything about it at all.

The Senator from Minnesota said it was an indication of the incapacity of Senators for comprehending these subjects that the Senator from Vermont and myself had ventured to comment upon the propriety of this transaction. How could we know anything about it? The committee have had the bill before them for weeks deliberating upon it. In the secret recesses of their conclave they have arranged this matter to suit themselves, and what presumption it is for the ordinary members of this body, without the opportunity of being on the Committee on Commerce, having no interest at stake except that which concerns the welfare of the country and the condition of the public Treasury, to venture to inquire upon what theory of constitutional law, upon what theory based on the welfare of the people, we are asked to appropriate $150,000 for a work that has been paid for, and that these people are entirely willing the Government shall take possession of, if we can judge by their own statement, because they say that from this time on the tolls that they derive from the canal are to be devoted to the reimbursement of the United States for the money advanced in the expenditure on the canal.

Sure enough, what interest have they got in it? They have got the profits of the transaction. The canal is built. The tolls that are paid must go to the United States Government to reimburse what has been paid out of the Treasury for its construction. Yet the Senator from Minnesota informs us that they hold on to it with a desperate grasp, and refuse to allow it to go; and he insists that if we take it we shall pay this excess of $150,000 built up of such items as I have described.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I venture to say that no Senator desires to be misled by statements picked out here and there from reports, part of which are made by the engineers of the Government in answer to a resolution inquiring about this matter, part of which, and the last clause which has been read, made by the State inspector of the canal appointed by and acting solely in behalf of the State of Wisconsin in its relation to the canal, and partly by the statements from which the Senator from Kansas has read different items in different places, detailed statements made to the engineers appointed by order of Congress to ascertain what was the condition of the canal and its accounts.

If any other branch of the public service, if any other appropriation bill could be attacked in the way the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Vermont have attacked this bill by miscellaneous statements, by garbled extracts, by reading a little here and a little there, and by the distinguished Senator from Vermont rushing to the attack of this bill with a story about rats and crying "rats, rats," as the argument to frighten Senators here, as if in that great overflow and rush of rats upon the people in one of the islands of the Rhine to frighten the people and the whole community from considering fairly a question, I think there is no bill which could pass the Senate in the course of a month or two. There are no bills but what are liable to attacks of that kind. There is no bill whatever but what statements made in reports without the corresponding remarks upon them would present to the mind of a Senator some unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of War, or the Postmaster-General.

I am not the special advocate of this bill. I have no other than the general interest in this bill which the people along the whole great chain of lakes have in it. I say to the Senator from Kansas, coming from a State which has already received great benefit by the improvement of rivers outside of his State (for unfortunately there are no rivers in Kansas that have any navigable interest, perhaps, except the Missouri), whatever he may say about this matter, the people of Kansas are to-day receiving more benefit from the improvement of the rivers and harbors and water ways of the United States than any other State in this nation. Yet they never did have an advocate on this floor; I do not know that they ever had a vote in favor of any appropriation to improve the great water ways and harbors of the country, not even so much as a vote in favor of a light-house along a dangerous coast.

So to me and to other Senators it is no wonder that the Senator from Kansas attacks this bill, as he always attacks river and harbor bills, and that perhaps without having had the opportunity of examining or thinking of any particular thing he seizes upon some point on which to make his attack upon the chairman of this committee and the members of this committee, and hold out to the country that they have not only been untrue to the trust confided to them, but that they have been remarkably ignorant. Those attacks have come annually. Whether the bill went through or whether the bill failed, whether it was postponed for lack of time to consider it, as last year or as the year before, whether it went through the discussions of the other House, the Senator from Kansas has shown his continued, his unwearying, his undilapidated opposition to all improvements of the highways of the people of the United States. Whenever they come up I expect it.

My friend is constituted so that he must let off about so much attack upon appropriation bills and upon other bills in this body. My friend is so constituted, with so many bills for the District of Columbia under his charge, that he has not time nor does he care to defend any other than the numerous bills relating to the District of Columbia, the committee for which has him at its head as chairman; and I must say, in the proper line of his duty, in the investigation of subjects which the Senate has committed to him, there is no man in the Senate who pursues his investigations and arrives at his conclusions and presents them to the Senate with more force and more clearness than the Senator from Kansas as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Sir, it would be a great benefit to the country, it would be a marvelous benefit to the Committee on Commerce, if it were possible to withdraw the Senator from Kansas from the arduous and tedious labors of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and if he could give a day in a week, a week in a month, a month in a year, to the consideration of those vast, overshadowing interests which come to the door of every man, and the interests of every man, woman, and child, from the remote regions of the West along to the borders of our Atlantic coast, and from the remote regions of the West over the mountains and over the hills to the borders of the Pacific coast. I would to God his efforts had been directed in that way, with his marvelous strength and with his marvelous powers of condensation, for if there is any one thing in my judgment in which my friend from Kansas excels more than another he excels in condensation of thought and study and examination in the defense of his bills, and the other thing in which he excels is in denunciation of his fellows, of their work, of their study, and of the confidence which their brethren here have reposed in them.

But let that go. If the Senator has made an impression upon the minds of Senators here as to this bill or this report that is printed and open for every Senator to examine, item by item and parcel by parcel, he has done it by that superior, by that almost superhuman power which God has given him for some wise or unwise purpose (it is not for me to decide) to make the worse appear the better side, and to attack the labors of his fellows here with statements which I say run from item to item and then skipping here and there to other items.

I ask Senators to take this report of the Committee on Commerce, and take the several reports which have been made and examine them for themselves, and if there shall have been a false impression made by the comments of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Kansas, in justice to the committee, in justice to the Senate, in justice to the interests of the people who live along our lakes, who desire this navigation to be free, I would ask that this amendment be passed over until time shall be given to Senators to take that executive document with all the statements, and more statements than the Senator has read, and if they be mathematicians, if they be accountants, if they be sensible men, they can arrive, without a word from me or without a word from the Senator, at a full, fair, free understanding of this subject, and can judge for themselves whether there is anything right or anything wrong in this statement.

For one, sir, I shall not, even under the lashing tongue of the Senator from Kansas, submit to the statements he has made, either in regard to the carelessness, or the ignorance, or the bad faith of that committee with which I have labored so long and labored so faithfully, with the Senator from Minnesota at its head. The Senate knows that that committee in its reports to the Senate, in its investigation of the thousand questions it has presented here, has the confidence of the Senate. The Senate knows that when it reports a creek bill, or a harbor bill, or a light-house bill, or any bill affecting the great diversified interests of this country committed to its charge, it takes it on trust that it has not been deceived, that there is no member of that committee who would tamper, either for selfish interest, or State interest, or any other interest, with the confidence of the Senate. If there is any other committee—and I say it with pride of that one committee to which I belong—if there is any other committee which has more of the confidence of the Senate than the committee that investigates all the questions relating to navigation and commerce, and light-houses, and life-saving stations, and rivers and harbors, with the most careful and scrutinizing accuracy, I do not know it.

Having said so much, to get back to the place from which I started, I want to call the attention of the few Senators who are here to one statement made by the Senator from Kansas. He says that in one part of this report the board voted $45,000 of stock to the president and some of the directors. Now, it is mere accounting, I do not care on what side, to state what such a proposition is, for the paper shows it. This paper shows that in 1872 and 1873 certain of these stockholders advanced $45,000 as stock—not the proportion which might have been assessed to them, 10 per cent., but as a loan—making the amount, as this report shows, $68,000. The full-paid stock was given to them, but there was not full-paid stock issued to anybody else. It was issued merely as the evidence that they had loaned and advanced to this company for, this paper says, full-paid stock, $45,000; and, as is shown in another part of the account, they are the men who received $45,000 worth of shares. It is all one transaction.

The stock of this company never was worth and never can be worth the snap of a finger. Why? The law of the United States giving the land to the State of Wisconsin to build the canal left to the State the authority to build the canal or use that land, or the proceeds of it, as it in its judgment should think best. The State of Wisconsin under its constitution can not build a canal, if I remember aright; it can not engage in any public work. My friend from Wisconsin will tell me whether that is so or not. It is the case in the State of Michigan that the State can not undertake any of these outside public works of internal improvement under our constitution. Under the constitution adopted in 1850 we were compelled to sell the State railroad and the State canal to carry out that instrument.

But Wisconsin, as many other States have done, saw fit to turn over these lands either to an individual or individuals, or to a corporate company, and let that company build the canal. The provisions of the general law and the provisions of the law of Wisconsin declare that when all expenses of building that canal and keeping it in repair have been paid, then the tolls shall only be sufficient to pay the actual current working expenses upon that canal. What is the stock good for? Whenever the business on that canal brings in money enough to pay all the expenses, it is not worth a cent, and so Mr. Nader, the State agent, says when these expenses shall all have been paid, for he is recommending that the General Government take the canal, then the company has no interest in the canal. Why? Because the law of Congress and the law of the State of Wisconsin both say that when all these expenses of building, constructing, repairing, and working the canal shall have been paid, and as far as they are paid, the tolls shall be only in amount sufficient to pay for the management of the canal.

The cost of management of the canal is not great. There are no locks; it is an open channel through; but it has been dug from one portion of the lake to another on the same level from Lake Michigan to Green Bay. Only repairs to prevent the decay of the revetments or of the piers would be necessary. So this company have no interest except to get back the money they have put in the canal—not a dollar's worth.

The report of the company is made out item by item and is sent to Congress by a board of engineers required to examine this matter and report to us. The company say they have paid out one hundred and seventy-eight thousand and some hundred dollars more than they have received. That is their statement—one hundred and seventy-eight thousand and some hundred dollars more than they received from all and every source. Whether that is true or not I do not know. That is what the engineers who were ordered by Congress to report to us say; at least they send that as the statement by the company of their expenses.

The Senator from Kansas says compound interest is specified and marked out in these tables. I say I can not find, nor can you find, any case of compound interest. The company had its outstanding bonds. The company had borrowed $68,000 at one time and they had issued bonds for $10,000. There is a statement here of what each year, year by year, the company paid in interest on its borrowed money. It was due at the end of the year. They paid it at the end of the year. The next year there came other interest and they paid it, and the next year other interest and they paid it. There is no charge of compound interest in that transaction. There is a statement of what was paid year by year on loans.

I do not profess to be much of an accountant; my avocations have never led me to that branch of business, so that I may not understand all these questions well, but I submit to any gentlemen in the Senate who are accountants, who understand business, who understand how to make up accounts, whether the several very minute and full statements in the report sent us by the engineers through the Secretary of War are honestly and fairly made up. It may be all trickery, it may be all a sham, but all the material items and all the natural order of things and charges come in here, and there is no charge of $45,000 to the president and directors. There is a charge of $45,000 for their services. They borrowed money; they loaned money. When the company did not have money and could not sell its bonds they carried on by money advanced by themselves; they put their hands to the oar and built this canal and drove it through for the interest of navigation.

Senators here as well as myself are accustomed to bow with profound respect to any utterances of the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Vermont brought his atlas in here with him. Almost any man has to have something to play with when making statements about which he knows very little. Some play with their watch-chains, some roll their fingers, some scratch their heads, and the Senator from Vermont brings in his atlas always when there is any question of a locality here. He brought it in to-day, and here it is. He did not take it away with him; he had done with it; but the information which the Senator vouchsafed to the Senate—I wish he were here—is interesting to those who live in far-off lands and never have been on Lake Michigan, who have never been on the sandy point, the long sandy stretch through which this canal was cut. He says a tug would run in and get a boat and rush out, and a tug would run in and get another boat and rush out with the lumber that had accumulated on this little narrow point which he speaks of as being a narrow point stretching up into Green Bay. He says the time must come when the timber on this narrow point will get away from there where tugs are running in and out like rats—that was the expression and it is a very forcible one—running in like rats to get a raft or to get a boat that was loaded.

Mr. President, within miles of this canal either south or north, there is not a tree growing but a scrubby jack pine not so high as the top of this gallery railing, not a tree of hard wood, soft wood, pine, maple, beech, anything. It is an accumulation of sand separating Green Bay from Lake Michigan. There is no more timber on it—I say this to you Southern gentlemen—than on the sandy shoals that cut off Currituck and Albemarle and other sounds from the ocean. It is a great heaped-up bed of sand. Whether there be rocks under it to make the first foundation of that bay or not I do not know, but there is no timber on it.

the 26,000,000 feet of timber came from these sand-spits. The Senator never has been up there. He thinks it came from that little narrow region that runs up for 80 miles to the real outlet of Green Bay. No wonder his lack of knowledge in that respect might impose upon some of my friends who live in other parts of the country and have never known the geographical position of this sand-spit at all, whether it is loaded with pine or whether it has millions of acres, when he himself said it was crossed by a canal a mile or a mile and a quarter in length.

Where did this pine come from and what was this canal for? Extending from 70 or 80 miles farther south and west, connecting there by the Fox River with Lake Winnebago, connecting there with the Wisconsin, connecting by rail and water with the vast pine lands of Wisconsin, connecting further, opposite this entrance and on the shore west of this place and northwest of it, with the great iron mines of Wisconsin and of Michigan, Green Bay is the outlet of a commerce wonderful in extent. Millions and millions of feet of lumber come in there from all points, not from this sand-spit, but across Sturgeon Bay and across Green Bay and for 60 or 80 miles up into the pine regions of Wisconsin and all along up to the rivers which furnish the Menomonee and the Cedar and the Escanaba, and where millions of tons of iron ore are shipped every year to the markets of the world.

There comes out of Green Bay a commerce of a magnitude which would surprise any one who would look at it. Thus out into Lake Michigan, and thus to Chicago and Milwaukee, and thus down through Lake Huron and down through the Straits of Saint Clair, and through Lake Saint Clair, and through the Detroit River to Detroit, and to Toledo, and to Cleveland, and to Dunkirk, and to Buffalo, and to the Erie Canal, timber and iron are going down. Vast quantities of wheat go out of Green Bay down through the whole length of the lakes, and the coal and merchandise supplying a million people through that Green Bay channel with their merchandise, and carrying off millions and millions of feet of lumber and millions of bushels of grain out into Green Bay. They can go on down or come north, as you call it. They can go up 80 miles beyond the Sturgeon channel and find the natural outlet of Green Bay to get into Lake Michigan, and can come right back by this narrow strip and pass this Sturgeon Bay Canal to Milwaukee, and Chicago, and Michigan City, and the cities along the coast of Lake Michigan on the eastern side. They can go 80 miles around and come right back, or with this channel they can come straight across through inland waters, safe waters, and come out into the lake 80 miles nearer to the markets than they can by going down to Green Bay, as we would say, and coming out through the natural opening of the bay.

That is this project. In a very short time after it was finished, in a month or two, the report which has been read from shows us a thousand vessels going through, not going into this place to get a load, for there is nothing there, but going through into that great Green Bay, itself almost as great, if not quite as great, as Lake Erie; itself the outlet by water for all Northern Wisconsin and all the southern part of the upper peninsula of Michigan; itself the outlet for the vast lumber fields of Northern Wisconsin and the southern part of the upper peninsula of Michigan; itself the outlet for all that vast amount of iron ore which is taken down to mix with the iron ores of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and making a kind of iron from the two, the soft Lake Superior ore and the harder ores of those States—a mixture which gives an iron unsurpassed in the world for mechanical and art purposes.

That is the position of this lake. That is the position of Green Bay. That is the kind of produce that can save 80 miles of travel by cutting through this canal. That is the condition of a canal and a harbor of refuge, where above on the Wisconsin side there is no harbor of refuge until you come within 40 or 50 miles, or along the rocky and sand-spit ledges that divide Green Bay from Lake Michigan. There is not a harbor of refuge anywhere that in a northeastern storm would protect a vessel. This gives a perfect harbor of refuge running through this open spit into Sturgeon Bay. Land locked almost as it is, it gives a perfect harbor of refuge for the people traversing those great lakes.

Sir, I did not intend to say anything in regard to this bill; I did not intend to reply to the attack made upon it; but it becomes me to say that before the committee for the rivers and harbors there was great urgency for doubling the appropriation for a harbor of refuge on Lake Champlain, 5, 6, 7, 8 miles wide, where vessels were represented as being exposed to the storm and the tempest, and the mariners clinging with disheveled hair to the reefs to save themselves from premature death. I will not say who made those arguments before the committee. But here is a harbor of refuge, with probably one hundred vessels passing in front of it every day, which has already been the means of saving many lives and much property, where the Government thought it of importance enough to establish a life-saving station, where light-houses are built, where all who know about it understand its value to the commerce of the lakes which are lakes and in storms which are storms. What are the little storms that get up on Lake Champlain? Boys with bellows and with dog-carts could almost start them any time; but God makes the storms on Lake Michigan, and men tremble when He sends them among them.

Yet we must double the appropriation in this bill for a harbor of refuge at Burlington, Vt., by somebody's agency and urgency (I forget just now whose), but the only harbor of refuge on an extent of probably 150 miles in the worst coast we have on Lake Michigan, exposed to all storms, is the point of attack in this bill; and the point of attack is made against a canal company of which I care nothing, which I am not here to defend nor to extenuate.

The law granting the land to the State of Wisconsin said that when the canal was completed which the land was given to aid, and when all the expenses of it were paid, then there should be no more tolls than were necessary, and it should be as far as might be a free canal.

The State of Wisconsin incorporated in its law to the same extent that provision. The State inspector says that with the great increase in tolls there the time must come when this company will have received tolls enough so that it will not care whether the Government takes the canal or not. All we ask is to relieve the navigation before that time comes to take off these tolls; to let the shipping go free, to let the vessels that have stood the storms and tempests of Lake Michigan have a safe place to enter, and, when they have entered, to free them from the subjection to onerous tolls for their entry and for their passage through.

If I might be permitted to do so without creating any supposed sectional feeling or ill-feeling of any kind, I might say that the Government took the Louisville and Portland Canal, a canal which was constructed by a company for the benefit of the navigation of the Ohio River, enlarged it, put in new locks, merely took the channel, the crease which that canal company had built there and which had been in the early days of great benefit to the navigation of the Ohio River. The Government expended $2,000,000 in making a canal there that is the pride of our whole land, and for which every navigator on the Mississippi and Ohio to-day is thankful. The company expended their money, and when it was expended the old stockholders of that almost worthless canal went into court. When Congress took off the tolls on the new canal the old stockholders went into court and procured an injunction against the officers without taking off these tolls, saying the tolls were pledged to the expenses of the old company, that the tolls were pledged to reimburse the bondholders and the stockholders, and the Government paid $1,240,000 or $1,250,000, nearly a million and a quarter of dollars, to the old owners of that canal.

By the vote of the Senate, and by the vote of the other House, and by the approval of the President, this was done in the case of an old canal disused for years; an old canal which merely was the line, the thread of work for the new canal; an old canal of which the locks had been torn away in building the new, and where there was no trace of the old left when the new was done.

Did anybody complain that Congress to make free navigation immediately paid this million and a quarter dollars to the owners of the old canal? Nobody. Not a voice was raised here. The Senator from Kansas slumbered in his seat. The Senator from Vermont did not rear his towering form to the skies to denounce that as a steal.

I could multiply these cases ten, twenty fold, and state the occasions where, for the sake of making free navigation for our commerce, the Government has taken works that companies have built and paid them what was right for them in order that they might the sooner make that channel of communication free to the vessels and to the navigation and commerce of our country.

That is the object of this amendment. If there is $178,000 that by fair accounting belongs to that company before they can be required to reduce their tolls to the minimum of merely seeing to the repair of the canal and keeping it in order, let it be paid. This amendment limits it to $150,000, and that only on the report of your own engineers that the payment is a proper one, that so much ought to be paid in equity and in justice to this company before you make it a free canal. That is all there is in this provision.

We give millions and millions of dollars to make through rapids, to make through gravel beds, and to make through rocky reefs passages for our own vessels without charging them any toll. We are all the while engaged in it. Here is a bill of $15,000,000 or $18,000,000, whose sole object ought to be, and I conscientiously believe is, to make the great highways of the people of the United States better and freer from cost and expense, to cheapen transportation, to bring to the farmer the value of his wheat without the enormous freight charges which might otherwise accumulate upon it in whatever part of the United States he may live. This is one object, to cheapen lumber, to cheapen the transportation of wheat, to reduce the rates of insurance, to make iron come to our markets cheaper and freer than it does now.

All the Western States get their lumber from Minneapolis, or from Chicago and Michigan City. Kansas can not build a house, nor a board fence, nor a barn, nor shingle a roof without paying tribute to the cost of transportation by water and by rail. Kansas can not get a bushel of its grain to the general markets of the world without paying whatever charges can be sustained as freight charges upon that bushel of grain.

Sir, if there is any value at all in these appropriation bills for rivers and harbors it is to enable the common people of the United States, the farmers, the men who work in woods, the men who work on the plains, the men who gather the little produce that they can sell and by their labor get ready for market, getting it there, to receive a few cents a bushel more for their grain, a few dollars more during the winter for their labor in the pine woods, a few dollars more a month or year for delving down in the dark recesses of the iron mine.

There is but little sympathy for that class of people. There are very few who seem to care whether the farmer can get his slight produce upon which he must live the rest of the year to market in such a way as to save part of its value to him. There are very few who care whether our miners, who do not see daylight from Monday morning till Saturday night, down in the deep iron mines of Michigan and Wisconsin, have for their families who dwell on the surface food during that time and clothing and education. There are few here who seem to care whether our lumbermen in the forests of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, who leave their homes in November and return when the snow is quite gone in March and April, and endure hardships which would blanch the hair of Senators who talk so flippantly about not caring for the interests of this class of men, when all winter long in the woods they are laboring, away from all civilized society and away from their families, all winter long, wakened by nothing but the thundering crash of the pine which their sturdy blows have at last brought to the ground. Who cares for these lumbermen? Who cares whether they have easy markets for their lumber? Who cares whether 1,000 feet of lumber from the sale of which they get their pay brings $3 more or $3 less on account of the disproportionate and unfair charges for freight?

Ah, sir, in the sumptuous Senate Chamber, lolling in our easy chairs, with maps brought to us to find unknown and undiscovered countries by pages whom we pay, how little thought there is of the toil and privations of those men, not even like the farmers having homes in which to live, but the miners and the lumbermen working in the woods and then driving down in the late spring freshets their freight from the highlands, driving down these rivers the logs, exposed continually to death at every turn of a log and every slip of the pole?

Why should we think of the common people of the United States? Why should the sneers of men in high place, men of keen wit, men of great cunning, men of vast powers of sarcasm fall on part of a bill introduced here in behalf of the interest of the sailor on the lakes, the miner in the mines, the lumbermen in the forest and on the stream, the farmers in the far-off Northwest? Why should they be sneered out of existence and out of thought by those who have never known labor or want?

Sir, it has been my lot to be among those people, to be one of them, during the long winters in the forest; to go up and down in the mines; to engage in all the labor and hardships and trials and privations of far-off frontier life. When I forget the toil and the care and the anxiety of those with whom forty years ago I had something of an honorable association, when the sneer will turn me from yielding to their demands, I shall no longer deserve to represent the interests of my people with my feeble capacity upon this floor.

There is the bill, there is that provision safely guarded, well warranted, no money to be expended except on the report of a board of three engineers of the Army, supposed to be honorable men, appointed by the present Secretary of War; he shall determine that this purchase is desirable, that it is reasonable, that it is for the advantage of commerce and navigation, guarded carefully and safely from the least possible expenditure until all this provision shall have been ascertained to have been correct and satisfactory to the Secretary of War; and for one I have no fear but that the Secretary of War will see that the requirements of the bill are complied with by the report, and that no detriment will happen to the Republic of the United States by reason of the Senate's action on this appropriation.

Sir, it has been my fortune to have served in Congress for almost eighteen years, and during a great part of that time to have been upon the Committee on Commerce in the House or in the Senate, and I say that no appropriation that I ever knew of in the House was recommended to the House, with all the carping and all the criticism about it, until every report both of the Secretary of War, of the Chief of Engineers, of the local engineer in charge of each work had been made, and in most cases read aloud, with each succeeding appropriation for that particular work, until members of the committee who have been long on that committee can, if the name of the place be mentioned today, with their pencil make a rough sketch of whether it be river or harbor, whether it be deepening of the channel or whether it be removing rocks, or whatever it may be, and can tell from the continued reiteracy of their examination of these different bills what the identical work is as well as the Chief of Engineers.

He who charges the Committee on Commerce, I might say in either House, but I say in the Senate, with whom I have had the honor of acting for the last five and a half years, with not bringing a conscientious desire to discharge their duty faithfully to the Government and the people, to the Senate, to the interests of commerce and navigation, not to mislead a Senator, not to impose an uncertain and a doubtful improvement upon a Senator or upon the Senate, does them foul damage and wrong.

Whether I shall ever have occasion or not to speak upon this question again, here in my place, without fear of contradiction from any and all Senators, newspapers, the world at large, I make the assertion, which I believe will not be contradicted, that there is no committee in this body or in the other, in Congress, that has come to the performance of its duty with more painstaking investigation, with a more conscientious desire to frame and prepare a bill which should be in accord with our institutions, with the rules of the Senate, with the sentiment of the people, with the views of the Executive, as far as may be, than the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take any part in the discussion of this question, not thinking it would be necessary to do so; and it would not be necessary to do this except that the two blind Samsons of the Senate have put their hands around the pillars of this bill and sought to bring down the whole structure of internal improvement and river and harbor navigation, though it crush them and the interests of the people in its ruins. But for that I should not have said anything here, and I leave to others the more full defense of this bill both in its details and in the principles upon which it is founded.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I never was indicted for any heinous crime; but when I listened to the vindictive arraignment of the Committee on Commerce by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee and his great colleague the Senator from Kansas, I began to think that my time was short here; that probably with the rest of the Committee on Commerce we should find ourselves in the Old Capitol prison before night. But after having delivered that vindictive indictment the Senator from Vermont kindly took himself out of the Chamber, not caring to hear any of the arguments which might be urged in favor of the committee or of this appropriation. Of course after a casual examination by the Senator from Vermont of this proposition and of the report in the case he was undoubtedly able to satisfy himself that this amendment ought not to prevail, and therefore it was a waste of time for him to listen to any of the committee or to any of the explanations which they might make.

But after the defense of the Committee on Commerce by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], I will venture in my own way to say a few words in regard to this amendment and the wisdom or unwisdom of its being adopted.

In the first place, the amendment does not compel the purchase of this canal or the payment of the $150,000 unless the Secretary of War upon an examination made by a board of three United States engineers is satisfied as to the importance and value of the free use of the canal and the harbor of refuge to the commerce and navigation of the country; and secondly, unless he is satisfied as to the reasonableness of the price mentioned, $150,000. So, before this theft, as it has been characterized by the Senator from Kansas, upon the Treasury of the United States of $150,000 can be consummated, another board of Army engineers must investigate this question, and their report in these directions must receive the approval of the Secretary of War.

Whether that is a sufficient guarantee and protection to the Treasury of the United States I am not prepared to say; but if any Senator can suggest any amendment which shall make it stronger and which shall make it certain that this canal shall not be purchased by the Government or taken by the Government unless it is necessary for the commerce and navigation of the lakes and unless the price named here shall be found reasonable and satisfactory, as one of the committee I should be glad to have any such amendment offered.

Now, a few words, and plain words, as to the history of this whole transaction. When this great country of the Northwest and of Wisconsin began to be settled years ago, and when ships began to go there to trade, to bring away its wonderful wealth of timber and minerals, it was found that a great saving could be made to the navigation if a small canal could be constructed across a peninsula which separates the body of water known as Green Bay from Lake Michigan. By the construction of that canal dangerous navigation of about 150 miles would be saved to every vessel going into and coming out of Green Bay. The commerce of the lakes sought for relief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would depend on where they were bound.

Mr. MILLER. It would make very little difference as to where they were bound, as the Senator from Vermont suggests, for all the great commerce of that country must of necessity come down the lakes, and its business is found in that direction. Of course, some of it might go north and it might not need it, but I say the commerce of the lakes sought for relief.

It was in the days when the Federal Government was not doing very much toward internal improvements. The great question of the constitutionality of carrying on works of internal improvements in the different States by the Federal Government was perhaps not fully settled in our policy; but the Federal Government was in the habit of making land grants to States for the purpose of aiding the States in constructing works of this kind. It was for a purpose of that kind that the Government gave, I believe, a large grant of land to the State of Iowa, and it has given such grants to many other States.

So finally the Congress of the United States said to the State of Wisconsin, "If you will build this canal we will give you 200,000 acres of the public land in your State," and an act was passed. But the State of Wisconsin for some reason or other did not seem willing to undertake the work as a State. Matters went on until it was necessary for Congress to pass an extension bill, for the time had expired in which the State could build the canal and take this land. The time was extended, and finally the State of Wisconsin, not being willing to build the canal itself, found some of its own citizens who were willing to undertake it on condition that the State would give to the company thus organized this grant of 200,000 acres. So finally a charter was granted by the State of Wisconsin to a company to construct this canal.

That act was passed in 1868, but even after the State had passed this charter and the company had been organized it found itself unable to obtain funds enough to go on with the work, and it was not until in 1872 that the company finally secured funds sufficient and mustered courage enough to undertake the enterprise. Then it began it and it constructed the first quarter of it, completing that in 1874. Then the work dragged again. The funds of the company were not sufficient to push it on to successful completion, and it was not fully completed until some time in 1882, there being a period of ten years in its construction.

Then the State of Wisconsin had turned over to this company the 200,000 acres of land, and out of the proceeds of that, together with the moneys the company had invested in its own stock and which it had borrowed at the beginning, the work was at last completed.

There has been a movement upon the part of the commerce of the lakes to make this canal free and to relieve commerce from the burdens of the tolls levied on the commerce passing through it. It was with that view that in 1882 a resolution was offered in this body to which Executive Document No. 34, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, is an answer, and it is growing out of that investigation, and the subsequent demand of commerce for the freedom of the navigation of this canal, that the Committee on Commerce, considering this matter carefully, finally voted this amendment into the bill.

There are only two business propositions connected with this which should have any weight with the Senate in deciding whether it will leave the amendment in the bill or whether it will take it out: First, as to the necessity of this canal and its importance to the commerce of the great lakes; and secondly, as to the compensation that should be made to the canal company if the property is taken from them.

First, as to its importance. The Senator from Vermont, looking upon the atlas, judged that the peninsula across which it is constructed and the lands adjacent upon the other side were simply timber lands, and that in a few years all the pine timber would be removed, and there would be no longer any commerce or any necessity for the canal. If that supposition is correct, then the United States Government wants nothing to do with this canal; but what are the facts? Green Bay, which is cut off from Lake Michigan by this peninsula, except at the outlet much farther north, a distance of from 50 to 75 miles, is a great body of water, and the commerce upon its shores is of great importance to the country.

But if the Senator from Vermont, who watches so carefully after all the legislation of this body, had gone back in his memory a few years he would have found that the United States Government has been expending for many years many millions of dollars upon the Fox River, which enters into the head of Green Bay. We have made the Fox River navigable for large steamers from its mouth in Green Bay up to Lake Winnebago, a large lake and a wonderful body of water, and from there on the canal extends until the total navigation connected with this public work is very large. And remember, this canal and this improvement of the Fox River is not a State canal. The State of Wisconsin has nothing whatever to do with it. It has been constructed entirely by the United States Government. I say that canal extends into the interior of Wisconsin, I think a distance of one or two hundred miles. How near am I correct? I ask the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAWYER. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. MILLER. What is the distance from the mouth of Fox River to the end of navigation improved by the Government of the United States? How far is the Wisconsin now navigable?

Mr. SAWYER. In the neighborhood of 200 miles.

Mr. MILLER. This work is completed and now navigable from the head of Green Bay a distance of 200 miles, and I need not tell the Chairman, and I need not tell the Senator from Vermont now that I have reminded him of it, that the original project in the improvement of the Fox River was intended to connect the great lakes with the Mississippi River and to make a free water way from the Upper Mississippi into the great lakes and through the great lakes down to the sea at the port of New York.

We have been going on year by year expending, as I have said, millions of dollars, and instead of this little canal here giving convenience to a small lumber interest, the canal as it is constructed drains the great body of the State of Wisconsin, and upon its shores, or at least in the country which is tributary to it, I have no doubt one quarter of the entire population of that State is located; and upon the Fox River, which has been thus improved, there are to-day manufacturing establishments of great number and turning out products of millions of value. In short, right upon that improvement in this Northwestern country is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, water-powers in the United States, and to-day on that river are several hundred important manufacturing establishments, and in the near future it is to be the great manufacturing center of the Northwest.

Much Eastern capital has been put into the improvement of manufactories upon that stream. Horatio Seymour, once the honored governor of the State of New York, was interested in its first improvement. It has been my good fortune in later years to also be connected with the manufacturing improvements upon that river, but it has grown so rapidly and so enormously that the West no longer needs any help from the East, and we have retired from it.

But when the Senator from Vermont sneers at the commerce which shall pass through this lake he sneers at one-half of Wisconsin, at one-half of its wealth and its industry and its intelligence; and I would advise him hereafter when he talks about a question of this kind and brings in his atlas to study it long enough to find out where the thing reaches.

So much as to the importance of this improvement. I have said enough to show that there is no more important work to-day in this country, considering its cost, than this very canal we are talking about. All this commerce which comes down the Fox River improvement and out of Winnebago Lake, if it shall go to the great city of Chicago, or if it shall go to the West, it is much cheaper and safer that it shall come into Lake Michigan through this canal than that it shall go through the dangerous navigation it must if it goes around the head of this peninsula.

I think I have said enough to convince any unprejudiced mind of the importance of this work and of the importance of making it free to all the commerce of the lakes.

Now, Mr. President, as to the question of how much should be paid for this if the Government is to take it, the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Vermont have grown witty over an attempted dissection of the accounts made up by this company and presented in this report. I do not care to say much about that.

The Senator from Kansas denounces with fiery indignation the putting of a few hundred dollars into this statement for the services of a lawyer in connection with the organization of this company. Mr. President, he is a better judge than I of the value of a lawyer to a company in properly preparing its incorporation papers and seeing to the organization of the company. I will not join any issue upon that. But the Senator tells us that these accounts are cooked; that when the company have put in here a thousand dollars a year for the services of the president and perhaps another thousand dollars a year for the services of the treasurer they are all fictitious. Why, sir, I have shown you from the record that this company was unable for six or eight years to do very much in the way of building this canal; that the company was organized, that the surveys were made, and that the company issued its own notes and borrowed money to go on and complete the first quarter of the canal, which seems to have been the condition upon which it was to receive one quarter of the land grant.

I do not know what ideas a great lawyer may have upon the value of a plain business man; but when we look at the charges made by the great lawyers of this country for a few days' services in the Supreme Court of the United States, when we look at the salaries paid to the attorneys of railroad corporations running up as high as $25,000 and $50,000 a year, we find out something of their ideas in regard to the value of their own services. But I take it for granted that the great corporations of this country know something of the value of the business men who organize them, who conceive them, who put them into operation, who have made all the great internal improvements of this country, who have built its railroads and its canals, and who have made this country what it is, and some of the great corporations of this country recognize the value of business men in paying to their presidents $25,000 and $30,000 and sometimes $50,000 per year as salaries.

Undoubtedly in the beginning of this work the officers could not do a very great deal. Their account shows that they were borrowing money upon their own notes, and the Senator from Kansas denounces the interest paid upon discounting their own notes as an outrageous and fictitious account. Well, Mr. President, that is a strange business principle. These men made their own notes and discounted them in bank and took the proceeds to help build this canal. Was not the discount a legitimate charge upon the enterprise? I venture to say there is not a sensible business man anywhere in this country who would for a moment question the legitimacy of the charging of an interest account upon all the moneys furnished in an enterprise like this from the date of its beginning up to the hour of its completion. It is all a part of the expense until the work is done and until it begins to bring in an income. Is it not? Most certainly it is; and this account is full of charges for interest, full of charges for discount upon notes. They were so short of money that they were compelled to shin around not only the banks of the West but even down to New York. Here are numerous items paid for the collection of drafts upon New York. I suppose that was entirely legitimate. I suppose that if a business man drew a draft in Minneapolis, or in Appleton, or anywhere in Wisconsin, upon New York, he would have to pay some exchange to get the money, and if he wanted the money bad enough to pay the exchange, I think that exchange would be a legitimate charge upon the enterprise in which he was engaged. If a man engaged in ordinary private business failed to charge up his interest account, his discounts, and his charges for collection, he would very soon find himself in the bankrupt court.

And, Mr. President, this account does undoubtedly call for compound interest, and it should. As to the bonds that were issued, over which the Senator from Vermont has grown so comical, if he had read the statement closely he would have found that the service for which this man was paid was not only for negotiating these notes but it was for his whole financial transactions. This man was the financial agent of the company, and not only sold these bonds, but he helped the company through the discount of its notes in various banks, raised money for it, and helped to carry the company along. I undertake to say that there is not a charge in this account for compound interest which is not as legitimate as every dollar which was raised for the canal, and I defy any man who understands ordinary business principles as connected with any of the coporations of this country or with any of its manufacturing industries to question that statement.

It does appear here that they voted to the officers of the company $45,000 of its stock as full paid. What that stock is worth I do not know. It may be worth $45,000; it may be worth $4,500; it may be worth 45 cents. If the United States Government decide to take this property, it is worth simply what we shall decide to give them. That is all.

I have not gone over these accounts carefully, but I find in the summary that the total cost of the construction of this work, including these enormous salaries of a thousand dollars a year to the president, and a thousand dollars a year to the secretary and treasurer, and $600 to the engineers, and the discounts, 8, 10, and 12 per cent., together with exchange upon New York, and with the interest figured up every year from the time the work began until it was completed and was able to earn something in the way of tolls—the president of the company has put it down at $642,615.57. They received out of the sales of the 200,000 acres of land, in round numbers, I think $344,000—let it go at that, more or less—and it appears some $53,000 for timber trespasses.

I do not care to go into the details of these accounts any further; they are here, they show for themselves. I do not hesitate, however, to claim that these charges for salaries, for engineers' expenses, for discounting their own notes in bank, or paying a discount upon their notes on which they raised the money to build the canal, and the figuring of compound interest upon all the money that was put in it from the time it began until its completion, are unquestionably legitimate.

It would seem from the act of Congress granting this land to the State of Wisconsin that after recompensing herself and reimbursing herself for all the cost of the completion of this work, she was then to maintain it at only such a rate of tolls as would keep the canal in proper repair. The State of Wisconsin did not undertake to do that work, but permitted a company of its own citizens to do it, and to that company it gave this grant of 200,000 acres.

What I desire to submit is this, and it seems to me that every fair man must admit it, that this company of private citizens who undertook that work are entitled to some recompense. It is not merely sufficient that they should recover back simply what it cost to construct the canal; and if their own accounts are to be taken that sum is $178,168.58. The committee, without going into a full accounting and examination of their accounts, put in here the lump sum of $150,000, believing that the company would prefer to take that rather than to go on and manage the canal and continue to secure tolls until they shall have reimbursed themselves for their entire expenditures; for I do not believe that any lawyer in this body will undertake to say that under the act of Congress and under the charter granted by the State of Wisconsin we could dispossess them from this canal until they had recouped themselves in tolls for every dollar they had put into it.

I say I do not believe that any lawyer in this body will assert any other doctrine than that, for certainly under the act of Congress and under the charter granted by the State of Wisconsin they can not be entitled to less; and is it reasonable to believe that any set of sane men would have taken this charter and constructed this canal if there was danger that they would be dispossessed of it before they had recovered back all the moneys put into it? I think not, and I think that provision in the amendment is well guarded. I have said already that if any Senator can suggest any language which will guard it more certainly against the improper acquirement of this canal or the paying more than should come to the builders of it, for one I shall be glad to accept it.

Mr. President, there is another question, and that is as to the public policy of the Government of the United States taking canals like this and making them free. For one I do not hesitate to say that I believe it to be wise public policy to do it. We have done it in several cases, notably in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal around the Falls of the Ohio River. I do not believe there is a single Senator here who would desire to take back that action. Here is another case, which, if not as important as that is to-day in the Ohio River, will, in my judgment, in the increase of population which is taking place in Wisconsin and in the great Northwest, within a very few years be as important as the canal at Louisville.

There are two or three other cases of this kind in the country where the United States Government acting with State governments has allowed private individuals to come in and make public improvements and to collect and levy tolls from all the commerce passing through them. I believe it was unwise in the Government when it started upon that plan years ago. We have abandoned it. The Government of the United States would not for a moment think of allowing a private company to build a canal of this kind and charge tolls upon it now; but it has been done in several cases and done with the consent and knowledge of the United States.

What are we to do now? In my judgment the wise thing to do is to secure to the ownership of the United States these canals which are of the importance of which I have spoken. This is one; there are a few others, but very few, in this country, and when they shall have come into the hands of the United States and the tolls shall have been taken off, great relief will come to the commerce in the sections where these canals are located.

What have we done, Mr. President, at the gateway of the great Lake Superior? We have built there at the head of the Saint Mary's River the greatest ship-lock in the world, at a cost, I think, of between one and two million dollars. It is so large that it takes in at one time four or five of the great ships which navigate Lake Superior, Lake Huron, and Lake Michigan. It has been completed but a few years, and even now the commercial interests of Lake Superior have come down here en masse and demanded that the Government begin at once to build another lock at that point as large as the one now there; and we have in this bill put in an appropriation, I think, of $250,000 to begin at once the construction of another great lock at the Sault de St. Marie. I believe it to be wise. Before that lock is finished there it will be found that the present lock, notwithstanding it is the largest in the world, is absolutely unable to properly carry on the business and the commerce which passes through there. That is a canal, just as much a canal as this is or any other. No vessel could pass from Lake Superior into Lake Huron, save it ran the rapids, until the first little lock was built, which gave place a few years ago to the present lock which we have there.

Mr. President, the United States Government has entered upon a career of taking off all shackles from the commerce which floats upon the water. No matter how much casuists may cry out against it, no matter how much the great railroads of this country may attempt to break it down and to prevent all river and harbor bills from passing, these great works will go on to completion, and woe be to that public man who stands in the way of them.

Mr. President, I do not care to say anything more on this matter now.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the original resolution of March 9, 1882, upon which the report of the Chief of Engineers was made to the Secretary of War, was in the following language:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, instructed to ascertain and report to Congress at its next session the cost of constructing the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship Canal, in the State of Wisconsin, and by whom said ship-canal was constructed; also, to ascertain the amount of money realized from the sale of the lands granted by Congress to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of said ship-canal; said information being required for the purpose of considering the question of opening said ship-canal free to the commerce of the lakes.

That was the design and purpose as appears from the language of the resolution, to ascertain in the first place what the canal cost, who built it, how they got the money, and in the next place to ascertain, if the Government should think it necessary to take possession of it, how much should be paid by way of compensation to those who were entitled to it under the act of Congress.

The purpose of my remarks hitherto has been to show that the cost of the construction had been entirely paid and that a profit remained over from the sale of the 200,000 acres of land that were granted by Congress to the State of Wisconsin for this purpose. The Senator from Minnesota, in his justification of the amendment of the committee to appropriate $150,000 to pay these people for the work that they had already constructed at a profit, attempted to show that there was a balance of about $178,000 that remained unliquidated according to the statement of the officers of the corporation. Is not that correct? And my purpose has been to show, so far as I could from the printed information in the possession of the Senate, that the statement of accounts made by the officers of the corporation was fictitious, or, as the Senator from New York called it in his observations, a cooked account. I did not intend to use any phrases that would be obnoxious or that in any way would be in derogation of the apparent good faith of these officers, but inasmuch as the Senator from New York has applied that designation to them inferentially, I will say that in my opinion the use of the term "cooked" as applied to these accounts is justified by an inspection of the evidence that is now before the Senate.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me. Does the Senator mean to say that I expressed the opinion that these accounts were cooked?

Mr. INGALLS. No; quite the reverse. I said the Senator endeavored to convey the impression that I had argued that the accounts were cooked. I did not use the word "cooked." I employed no such phraseology. I did not use that term at all. That term emanated from the Senator from New York; but inasmuch as he employed it, and as it is a description that has obtained currency with regard to such transactions, I will say that in my judgment there is no doubt that these accounts have been cooked for the purpose of producing the impression upon the mind of Congress that there is an existing balance unsatisfied in the construction and expense account of this canal.

I do not propose to rehearse what I have already said, but in addition to what has hitherto been mentioned, I have recently discovered further evidence in my investigation of this report to which I will call attention.

It seems that the Wisconsin Legislature in 1879 appointed a committee to examine concerning the expenditures of the company that constructed this canal, the amount of money they received from the lands, and the condition of the work. That committee made a majority and a minority report, certain extracts from the majority report being published by this engineers' report in the communication they made to Congress the 8th of January, 1883, in which it appears first:

The officers claim that they have an office in Milwaukee, which is the only distinctive office which the company has. The president, secretary, and treasurer draw no salary—and perform such official acts as devolve upon them at their private offices.

Mark, this was in 1879, seven years after this work was begun—

This work had been under contract for seven years. It began in July, 1872, and in 1879 this majority report of the committee of the Wisconsin Legislature declared that up to that time they had drawn no salary; that their work had been gratuitous, inasmuch as they performed their official acts devolving upon them at their private offices. When in 1882 these men come in and present a charge of $10,250 for the president alone, is not that cooking an account?

Mr. MILLER. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. INGALLS. It does not want any answer at all, because the document answers itself. A cooked account is one, as I understand, that is made up after the transactions are all over. If in 1879 the president of this company had not made any charge for services on account of his salary, had been acting gratuitously, when in 1882 he presented an account covering that period of seven years in which he charged a thousand dollars a year, that account was cooked, and there is no other description to make of it. It is bogus; it is an account that is prepared for the occasion. The same thing may be said about the salary of the secretary, which was declared to not have been asked for or paid, the services being rendered gratuitously.

On the 18th of November, 1882, ten years after the work was begun and three years after they had declared that they were charging nothing but had been rendering their services gratuitously, there is an account presented for the treasurer and assistant secretary of a thousand dollars a year. Was not that account cooked? What do you call that in the ordinary parlance of such transactions? When a man in response to the interrogatories of the State Legislature declares he has been acting gratuitously, that he has not charged any salary, and that his services have been rendered in connection with his private office, and in 1882 when it becomes necessary to manufacture a claim for a balance against the United States Government he puts in a charge of $10,250 for salary over that period extending from 1872 to 1882, is that cooked or is it not? Pretty thoroughly cooked, well done, and not rare at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. INGALLS. I will listen to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator for information whether the Committee on Commerce have in their possession or can furnish the Senate with copies of that majority and minority report made to the Legislature of Wisconsin, in which it would seem that the cooked or uncooked, the rare or the well-done—and I should think both—affairs of this concern went through an investigation?

Mr. INGALLS. No Senator has stated that; neither has the information come from the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there such information here?

Mr. INGALLS. There is no such information here, nor is there any evidence that this report was investigated by the committee, although it is a document of the United States, appearing in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1879, pages 1494–1505. I say in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont that the observations I am now making are in reply to criticisms which were presented by the Senator from New York on the remarks I had previously made, to the effect that I had improperly stated that these officials in endeavoring to pile up their accounts against the United States Government had, as he phrased it, cooked them. In other words, they had put in fictitious, simulated, fabricated accounts, not thought of until after the effort was made to sell this property to the Government of the United States. So much about the salary account as cooked.

The Senator from Michigan in his comments upon what I said declared that I had made statements which were not warranted by the report from which I had read, in that I stated that compound interest had been charged by this company in presenting their final statement to the Government; and as the Senator from Michigan is now absent from his seat, I suppose on business for the Senate, and I have not the opportunity of calling his attention to the pages of the report from which I read, in order that the public, those who may hereafter read his statement may judge between us on the question of veracity whether I introduced evidence here that was not warranted by the facts or not, whether I attempted to convey false impressions in declaring that these men had charged compound interest or not, I shall trouble the Reporter to take down the pages of this document from which I read. But before proceeding to that I will make one other observation, to the effect that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from New York do not agree in their views upon this subject. Whereas the Senator from Michigan declared that there was no charge for compound interest, thereby intimating that I had made a statement not warranted by the facts, the Senator from New York admitted that there was and justified it. Between the two you pay your money and take your choice; but now as to the fact:

On page 19, under date "September 10, 1873. Cash advances and interest to date, as per preceding statement, $31,490. Interest on same compounded annually to December 1, 1882," making an interest account, year by year, of $33,634.91, or $2,000 more than the principal, and an aggregate total principal and interest of $65,124.91. And yet the Senator from Michigan had the effrontery to say that I had not examined this report and did not know anything about it, and rather castigated me for venturing to express an opinion about a matter that I had no information whatever concerning.

September 10, 1873, cash advances and interest to date as per preceding statement	$12,190 00
Interest on same compounded annually to December 1, 1882—

Giving the amount year by year, making an interest account of $13,021.31, or over $1,000 more interest than principal, and an aggregate of $25,210.31.

On page 21:

September 10, 1873, cash advances and interest to date, as per preceding statement	$12,190 00
Interest on same compounded annually to December 1, 1882—

Total interest account, $13,020.31.

Total principal and interest	$25,210 31

Or a thousand dollars more interest than principal.

On page 22:

Stock received in settlement—

This does not seem to be even a money account—

Stock received in settlement, purchased by Mr. William B. Ogden December 11, 1875	$12,010 00

The interest compounded annually on this stock, and received in settlement down to December 1, 1882, total interest $12,828.05, or nearly $2,000 more interest than principal on the settlement of a stock account, and "total principal and interest $24,838.05."

And yet I am told that in criticising this matter I made a statement not verified by the record, that in making up these accounts for their presentation of their balance against the Government these men had charged compound interest, and the other member of the committee who addressed the Senate comes in and fortifies that statement by declaring that the Senator from Michigan was wrong and that I was right and the transaction was justifiable. Very well, it may be justifiable; but is it justifiable in making up an account against the Government of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me. This company has made up no account against the Government of the United States. It has not any account with it. The Government of the United States has not anything to do with the company unless it decides to take this property for public purposes; and when it does, then of course it must pay for it just as it is going to pay for the Library site out here; and so the Government asked these men to make a statement of what the property had cost them and they have made it. They have no account with the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New York would really be better advised if he was more intelligent. If the Senator knew more of what he was talking about he would really be better informed.

Mr. MILLER. I am much obliged to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator has a right to be much obliged, because I know of no man who stands more in need of information on this subject than the Senator from New York. Now I call his attention to page 6.

Mr. MILLER. I shall go to some other source than the Senator from Kansas to get my information.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I direct him to the report of this board of engineers. He says there never has been any claim of this canal company against the Government of the United States, and no understanding, no arrangement, no treaty, no negotiation, no sort of an understanding by which the Government of the United States was to take possession of this property, and that they presented no account even against the Government. I say, Mr. President, that this account was made up by this canal company at the request of this board of engineers, and presented entirely as the basis of a negotiation with the Government. When the Senator desires to criticise my statement he should come here better informed.

Mr. MILLER. I will criticise it when the Senator is through.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was no negotiation between the engineers and the company.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand of course there was no negotiation, but this board of engineers was authorized and established for the very purpose of ascertaining what would have to be done with this company in order to get the free transit of that canal. It is disputing the alphabet of this subject to deny that. That is what the inquiry of 1882 was made for, to ascertain how much we should have to pay this corporation in order to remove the impost of tolls from the commerce of the Northwest passing through this canal. And yet the Senator from New York tells me there has been no presentation of accounts against the Government of the United States.

Of course there has been no such presentation; but there was a presentation to this board of engineers appointed for that purpose to enable them to report to the Government how much it would cost to enable the United States to take possession of this property and remove the tolls from the shipping. I read from page 6:

As the Senate resolution calls for this information "for the purpose of considering the question of opening said ship-canal free to the commerce of the lakes," and the letter of instructions directs the board to "procure such information as in its judgment may be necessary to a proper investigation of the subject," the board obtained from the canal company full statements of receipts and expenses and moneys advanced, with interest charged, and that the amounts that they would expect to receive in case the Government should decide to take control of the work.

Yet I am told this never was presented with a view of preferring any claim against the Government of the United States, when this board of engineers called on them to make up their statement in order to ascertain what they would expect to receive in case the Government should decide to take control of the work.

That is a statement of the board of engineers derived from the canal corporation, that if the Government decides to take control of the work the amount they expect to receive is $178,168.58; and I have shown how that is made up, and do not propose to go over it again; but I state that it is fabricated, simulated, and fictitious, that it is made up almost wholly, with but very few exceptions, of estimates that were formed after this propositiou was presented to them by this board of engineers. It consists of interest compounded, of stock that never was sold, of salaries that never were paid. I believe it lacks in one very important estimate, in that it does not include the amount that was received for this land. And yet three years after that report was made, when this company has assured Congress that it has no pecuniary interest in this canal, that it would like to be relieved of it, we are recommended by the Committee on Commerce to pay out of the Treasury of the United States $150,000.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, of course I shall not call in question the great knowledge in regard to matters of this kind shown by the Senator from Kansas. He has been good enough to intimate that if I knew more I would be wiser. I wish I was wiser, and I hope the Senator from Kansas will impart some of his superabundant and supernumerary wisdom and information; but thus far I have not been able to imbibe any of it on this question. I suppose the lack is mine, not that of the giver.

The Senator has stated that these accounts are fictitious and, adopting my own language, he said "cooked." Mr. President, I know none of the members of this company. I know nothing about their character. He has intimated in the face of this report that their statement of moneys received from the sale of the lands is not correct. The Senator from Vermont intimated that quite likely they had formed a ring, or something of that kind, and sold the lands to themselves. I know nothing about that. It is entirely outside of this whole question; it has nothing whatever to do with it.

Here is a private corporation which holds a very important gateway in our commerce, and under the laws of this country it is entitled to take toll. The question is, how shall we rid ourselves of it. I have already stated what has been done heretofore in the appointment of a board of engineers to investigate this question and to determine what this work had cost and what it would cost the Government if we were to take it and make it free. The board, in the course of their investigations, called upon the company to make a detailed statement of what the work had cost them, and to say what they expected the Federal Government to pay them if it took possession of it. When I said that that statement was no claim upon the Government and no account against the Government, I simply stated what the cheapest and commonest book-keeper in this country would know to be true when the case was presented to him.

The officers of the Government asked the officers of this company to put down in a detailed statement what this thing had cost. These officers were under no obligation to render any account. They could simply have said, "This property is ours, and if the Government of the United States takes it it must take it by appointing a commission to assess its value and pay us its value." They could have stood absolutely upon that ground, and no court in this land would have taken it from them. Wherever the Government of the United States takes private property for public uses it first asks the owner to say what he will take for it, and he makes the offer, and if the Government is not satisfied with that it proceeds to condemn and take it by a commission, fixing its value. This company met the Government officers and presented their account. We are not under any obligation to look at it at all. We can say here by every right that this great water way, this gate, which they hold ought to be held and owned by the people of the country, and we will appoint a commission to assess the value of it and to take it, and there is no power in the company to prevent the United States Government from doing it.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Kansas has traversed this account and has declared that the items are fictitious and "cooked," I propose to look at them again for a single moment. Upon the question of the interest and the compound interest from the time the money was put in until the work was completed ready for commerce and was prepared to earn returns, I do not believe the Senator from Kansas himself, although he is a lawyer, will say that that is not a correct charge. I do not believe any reasonable man anywhere will make such a statement. He reads from the report showing that the interest thus compounded has amounted to more than the original loans. The simplest scholar in our public schools could tell us that money running at compound interest as long as the first advance made to this company did would have more than doubled itself.

Perhaps the Senator has discovered a new way of getting rich. If he will invest his salary here of $5,000 a year as Senator at the rate of interest prevailing in the West it will double itself in less than 12 years, depending upon what the rate may be, and I think that would be a legitimate way for the Senator to increase his worldly goods. I have no doubt he does it with all the money he has, and if it is loaned on bond and mortgage, or if it is in Government bonds or other securities, he collects his interest annually or semi-annually and reinvests it. He understands that, and so does every other business man.

But now as to the question of the officers' salaries. He says that they had been serving the company for ten long years and had made no charge for their services; but when the Government asked the company to give a statement of what the work had cost they put into it a thousand dollars a year for the president, and a thousand dollars a year for the treasurer or secretary, I do not know which, and he calls that fictitious and cooked. I am surprised at that statement.

Here were a few men; this company, as I understand, is composed of a very few men, perhaps not more than six or eight or a dozen in all. They were besought by the people living in that part of the country to take this grant from the State of Wisconsin and build this canal. They organized the company, took their charter, and after ten or twelve years of struggling with this work they completed it. It was all within themselves. They charged no salary, for they had no money with which to pay it; but will any one undertake to say that the services of this president and the services of this treasurer, who went about and borrowed the money here and there wherever he could to construct the canal, were worth nothing to this enterprise.

Suppose this company had started with all its money in hand that it received from this public land and from other sources; suppose it had started with a paid-up capital of $500,000; would not these officers have put in their bills and been paid for their services as officers? Undoubtedly they would; but so long as the matter was entirely in their own hands it mattered not to the president whether he charged up a salary or not. If he charged it up he would have to pay it out of his own pocket, for the company had no funds to pay it with. But when the United States Government steps up and says: "Perhaps we may want to buy this canal; will you tell us what it has cost? Will you tell us what you will take for it if we take it now?" these officers said: "A part of the cost of the construction of this canal has been the services of its officers, who have labored more or less constantly for it for ten or twelve years," as the case may be, and it was perfectly legitimate in estimating the cost of the canal to fix some proper sum for the services of the officers.

I say they were fixed at a very moderate sum, a thousand dollars a year for the president and a thousand dollars a year for the secretary or treasurer. I know of enterprises in the East, corporate enterprises, in which there are but a few stockholders, where the officers have served for long years faithfully and where the enterprises have even been profitable, in which the officers have never drawn a dollar of salary; but if you were to go to them and ask them to sell you their property, they would be very likely to figure up the number of years that they had given their attention and time to the development of the business. And that is what these men did. They have made no charge for their services, but when the Government came to ask for a purchase-price they put it in, and I think put it in very properly.

I have gone over this account somewhat carefully here to-day, and there are, so far as I can see, very few items to be questioned. But that is all outside of the question anyhow. Whether the accounts are right or not, if the Government of the United States propose to take this property, it must take it and pay a reasonable sum for it. I suppose we do not here as legislators propose to dispossess them of this property without some just recompense. They claim that in interest and in services and in the various ways which they have here described they have expended upon this work $178,000 more than they have received, and they have in this report substantially said to the Government, "If you want this work and want to make it free to the commerce of the lakes, you may take it now; we will relinquish our claim and our right to collect tolls for $178,000."

The Commerce Committee, in a sort of trading spirit, have said in this bill, "We will give you $150,000 for a perfect and clear title, provided that after another investigation by another board of Army engineers and after their report the Secretary of War shall approve it upon the grounds that it is wise and just that it should be taken for the public benefit, and also upon the grounds that this sum of $150,000 is a just sum to pay for it." That is all there is in this question, and you may spend a week in pettifogging over these little amounts and that will be the final conclusion. It turns on the question of public policy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think we had better take the vote on this question. I hope the Senate will proceed with the consideration of this bill until we get this item disposed of certainly. If we hope to get through with the business of the session in time to adjourn at a reasonable day it behooves the Senate, I think, to proceed with the business in hand. Certainly an executive session can be held at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to transmit to the House an engrossed copy of Senate bill No. 1526, "amending sections 4756 and 4757 of the Revised Statutes, relating to pensions of certain disabled persons who have served in the Navy or Marine Corps," the original having been mislaid in the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this resolution will be adopted and the Clerk directed to make the request of the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NAVAJO INDIAN AGENCY.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT VICKSBURG, MISS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 179 and that the same be now put on its passage.

The bill (S. 179) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-house, and internal-revenue offices at Vicksburg, Miss., was read, together with an amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire whether any United States court is now authorized by law to be held at this point.

Mr. CATCHINGS. There are no United States courts authorized to be held there now, and the bill does not so recite.

Mr. MORGAN. It proposes to erect a court-house.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir; a building for the use of the public offices there now, and as a court-house, if courts should be authorized to be held there.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish to inquire whether any United States court sits at this point now.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the very point about which I inquired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I must object.

VETO MESSAGE—CARTER W. TILLER.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up for present consideration a bill which has been vetoed by the President—the bill (H. R. 4002) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Carter W. Tiller, dependent father of G. W. Tiller, late a private in Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Before this matter is considered I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to introduce a resolution of courtesy on the part of the majority to the minority. There is no objection to it, I understand.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John T. Chancey be continued in the service of this House as heretofore until otherwise ordered, with the same compensation——

Mr. McMILLIN. I have demanded the regular order, and I can not exercise in this matter any respect of persons.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said on this floor with reference to the veto messages of the President on these private pension bills, and I think a great deal more has been said than ought to have been said; and there has been that character of talk which was not justified by the facts in the case or by the premises. At the outset, before stating this case, I wish to disavow any purpose whatever to criticise the President as to the exercise of a constitutional right which he possesses, or to make any attack on his methods or style in the veto of pension bills. These are matters in which I feel but little concern except so far as they relate to the general good.

The facts of this case are all set out in the report which I submitted on the 2d day of this month, and had printed in the RECORD, on pages 6448, 6449, and 6450. My object in submitting this report was to give every gentleman on this floor an opportunity to investigate to his satisfaction all the facts pertaining to the case. I regard it as a peculiar one. It was rejected in the Pension Office on the ascertainment of certain facts from the testimony of witnesses as well as from official letters addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions by the Adjutant-General. The bill was vetoed, as will be found by reference to the message, upon the ground principally that a charge of desertion stands against the military record of the son of this claimant.

On a subsequent investigation, an investigation had in the War Department after this veto message of the President had been transmitted to the House of Representatives, facts were ascertained which were fully set forth in this report by the letters from the Adjutant-General's Office touching the military record of this soldier, which I maintain will clear away every cloud from his record in the mind of every unbiased man. There was an effort made to investigate his military record before action was had by the Commissioner of Pensions upon his application for pension. From the information as furnished by the Adjutant-General to the Commissioner of Pensions there was room for doubt as to the military record of the soldier. This information was not based on a full investigation in the Adjutant-General's Office, as shown by his subsequent letters.

I am ready to say here, and I believe fully, that with the evidence before the President, or in the records of the Pension Office, his action in basing his veto upon the charge of desertion upon the soldier was to some extent defensible; but with the facts subsequently ascertained by an investigation of the records in the War Department—an investigation made in order to convince others and less credulous minds than those of the committee, there is no room for doubt upon that question.

Mr. Speaker, the veto message of the President rests upon two questions——

Mr. REAGAN. If the letters to which the gentleman alludes are not long I think he had better read them for the information of the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir; I propose to do so. They are printed in the RECORD, and I will call attention to them presently.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that there are two questions upon which the veto message of the President depends; first, that this father was not dependent upon the son for support. With reference to that this state of facts is found to exist from the record.

Mr. SENEY. What is the other ground on which the veto message is based?

Mr. TAULBEE. On the ground of the desertion of the soldier. I will bring them both up in their proper order.

The facts shown by the record with reference to the dependence of the father upon the son are about these: Carter W. Tiller was a plasterer by trade, and resided in the city of Louisville, Ky. In 1861 his only son, a bright, beautiful, and obedient boy, enlisted in Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Regiment, and followed his command down into Alabama.

In 1862 the soldier was captured by the confederates, and was afterward returned to duty, and served faithfully, as shown by his captain's affidavits, and also by the affidavit of the captain of Company B, of the same regiment, and of the second lieutenant of Company A, his own company, until the 20th of September, 1863, when, near Stevenson, Ala., he was found to be absent from his company; and on the making up of the muster-rolls for the months of September and October, 1863, the captain made this entry: "Deserted September 20, 1863." The subsequent report made by the Adjutant-General's Office, and taken from the prison hospital records of Andersonville, shows that this soldier was admitted to the hospital about July 21, 1864, and that he died on the same day from diarrhea.

These facts were ascertained by the Commissioner of Pensions when the father of this soldier applied for a pension.

Previous to the enlistment of the son the father had been disabled from the performance of manual labor; and the authorities of the city of Louisville gave him a position on the police force at $1.75 a day. That was in the year 1859. In 1864, while the father was still on this force of the city of Louisville, in the discharge of his duty as detective and policeman, he was shot with a bullet through the left arm and entirely through the body, rendering him, as shown by the affidavits of some of the most eminent physicians of Louisville, wholly incapable of performing manual labor. But, as shown by the written statement of my honorable colleague from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], a member of this House, who is well acquainted with this gentleman, Carter W. Tiller, he was retained on the police force more in consequence of his high standing as a man in the community in which he lived and for the valuable service rendered prior to his disability than for the service performed on the police force of Louisville.

Prior to the enlistment of this son he worked with and for his father. After his enlistment and prior to his death he contributed of his earnings, during his military service, to his father and his aged mother, who died a short time before his capture. In the message of the President this statement is found:

It is probably true that the son while in the Army sent money to the claimant.

On that subject, Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt. The captain of his company swears that he knows of this soldier having sent money home to his father more than once during his service. The second lieutenant swears that he carried of the allowance of this soldier to the father on two occasions, and $50 each time; and that he believes that he carried more money to the soldier's father, but of this amount he is absolutely certain. The captain, as well as this lieutenant, is certified in the record to be of good moral character and truthfulness and entitled to full credit. Now, upon that subject there can be no doubt that this son did contribute to the support of his father while in the Army.

It is further claimed in the President's message, and was claimed by the Commissioner of Pensions in adjudicating the question on the claim for pension, that this father's earnings were sufficient to support him prior to the death of his son without the necessity for contributions on the part of the son. There is printed in the record accompanying this case a schedule of the property belonging to this man from 1863 up to and including 1877, and I want you to pay close attention. It is marked upon the assessor's books as valued at from $150 to $250. It was a small frame house in the suburbs of Louisville, built on leased land, and its value was fixed at not more than $250. In 1867 the claimant found it necessary to dispose of the property and sold it for the price of $150, and never afterward was found to have by any one of the officers any taxable property in the city of Louisville, where he lived and worked.

Now the only reasonable conclusion at which I can arrive is this: That the income of this father derived from his position on the police force at Louisville was inadequate to his support, and that inadequacy was supplied by contributions of the soldier during his service in the Army. After his death it became necessary for the father to draw upon his little estate until in 1876 he had consumed it all.

There is a decision of the Pension Office which I wish to read in connection with this. It is found on page 179 of the Digest of the Pension Laws, and is a syllabus of an opinion of the Secretary of the Interior therein cited. It is this:

A father in receipt of a salary entitled to pension if employer has no legal obligations to contribute to his support and regards payment thereof as an act of charity.

That is one of the means of support which even the Secretary of the Interior says is not to be considered in connection with the adjudication of the question of dependence; and, as is shown by the record, the written statement of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS], who is acquainted with the facts, the salary which this man derived from his position was given him more as a matter of charity than as a remuneration for his services.

I maintain that even taking for granted that this salary of this man was amply sufficient for his support, with that statement of facts staring us in the face we must be driven to the conclusion that the income of this man under the ruling of the Secretary of the Interior could not properly be considered as a bar against his receipt of a pension.

Mr. REAGAN. If it would not interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky, I would inquire if he has information as to where this soldier was from the time he was marked as a deserter, in September, 1863, until he got out of Libby prison, and how he came there?

Mr. TAULBEE. Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the prison record of this soldier, there is but one witness who testifies in this case as to the capture of the soldier from personal knowledge; and that was a civilian employé of the regiment, or an attaché of the regiment, a teamster, who is certified to be of credibility and high standing in his community. He testifies that on or about September 20, 1863, he and this soldier, and another soldier perhaps, were captured by General Wheeler's cavalry at or near Bridgeport, Ala.

A MEMBER. At what date?

Mr. TAULBEE. On or about September 20, 1863. I think I will be able to show the precise date before I get through. The captain who made this entry on the muster-roll of the company afterward testified, and his affidavit is found in the record. The substance of his testimony is about this: A short time previous to September 20, 1863, he and his company and Company B of the same regiment were sent to guard a wagon-train of supplies from Stevenson, Ala., to Paint Rock, in the same State. He testifies that this soldier, George W. Tiller, was left in camp. The excuse for his being left he does not remember, but he does remember his excuse was a proper and a lawful one, and when he returned it was reported to him by "credible persons"—he uses that expression—that this man George W. Tiller was so sent out on some kind of duty, he does not remember the nature of it, but he was reported captured. This charge of desertion, as the captain swears, was entered against the soldier's military record from the fact that he as captain had no personal knowledge of the capture of this soldier. He seems to have entered this charge of desertion to begin on the last day of the presence of this man on the daily call of his company.

Witness Bottger, who testifies as to the capture of this soldier, says he does not remember the date, or he does not fix the date. He testifies that after they were captured they were turned over by General Wheeler's cavalry to General Longstreet at his headquarters. It is a matter of history, and General Wheeler's recollection will bear me out in the statement, that about this time or shortly subsequent to this date General Wheeler was leaving that immediate vicinity with his cavalry, after having patroled that country and captured a number of prisoners, and that he turned these prisoners over to General Longstreet at his headquarters.

Mr. SOWDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. Is there any evidence of any other members of this company having been captured about this time?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir; you will find that in the record. I am asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there is any record of other members of this company having been captured at or about the same time. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the suggestion; for I had taken the precaution myself to go to the War Department and have the Adjutant-General incorporate in his letter addressed to me a statement of a number of men who were captured at or about the same time and who were reported as deserters upon their company rolls and whose confinement in the confederate prisons corroborates the statement or the conclusion that they were captured at the time claimed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. At the same place?

Mr. TAULBEE. At or near the same place. Only one was captured with him, and I think he died in prison, as shown by the prison record. But, further, Witness Bottger, who testifies positively as to the capture, gives the history of his prison life, and in the record (which will be found in the report printed on page 6448 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) it will be seen that he is corroborated by the records of the confederate military prisons in every statement he makes. This man was taken to a rebel prison in Virginia, from there he was consigned to Castle Thunder, and Tiller, as Bottger testifies, was sent from there to Andersonville. There is no record reliable in the War Department of the prison at Andersonville during this period, and the authorities are driven to the necessity of relying upon the hospital record of that prison. Therefore we do not find Tiller's capture noted in the military prison records now in the War Department. The only evidence of his prison life is that we find that after his confinement in Andersonville, as is shown by the evidence of Bottger, he was admitted to the confederate prison hospital at Andersonville, Ga., and died there of diarrhea.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is one of the strongest cases that could be made by record and oral evidence. I maintain that the apparent discrepancy of dates between Bottger's statement of his capture, he having been captured with Tiller, and the date as given in the record precludes the idea of any fabricated statement on his part.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. How much is the discrepancy?

Mr. TAULBEE. Six days. The record of Castle Thunder, where Bottger was taken, is now in the War Department, and it shows that he was captured on the 6th day of September, 1863, that he was treated as a prisoner of war, and that he was kept in Castle Thunder for about a year and then discharged.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. If the House should refuse to pass this bill over the veto of the President, would that prevent this man from having a reopening and rehearing of his case at the Pension Office upon the additional evidence that has now been produced, and of which the President had no knowledge?

Mr. TAULBEE. It certainly would, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. How would it?

Mr. TAULBEE. There is a ruling of the Commissioner of Pensions here in which he holds, in substance, that after a man has applied to Congress for relief he has waived every right to a pension that he had under existing law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, there are several cases in which the statement has been made to this House that the applicants ceased further exertion here because since the time of the filing of their claims before the committees of this House they had been allowed pensions by the Pension Office.

Mr. MATSON. If my colleague on the committee [Mr. TAULBEE] will permit, I think I can explain the proposition in regard to which he has been misled. The Secretary of the Interior, or at least the Commissioner of Pensions, has held that where a man receives a pension certificate under a special act of Congress he is estopped from prosecuting any claim that he may have in the Pension Office; but there is no ruling which will prevent the man from completing any claim that he may have pending in the office because of his having made an application to Congress for relief.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, while we are on this point I will read the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions to which I have referred, and which is dated January 29, 1886. It is in reference to the case of Samuel Schuler. I read:

> This case coming before the Commissioner, he decides that, the pensioner having appealed to Congress for special legislation in his behalf, thereby waived his right under the general law, and should have plead before that body all the causes of action under which he believed himself entitled.

That is the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions, and therefore I was correct in what I said in answer to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY], that if we, as the representatives of the people, now deny this man the relief which he asks, he is forever barred under existing law, according to the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions which I have read. No other construction can fairly be put upon that decision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask members who are interested in ascertaining the real facts of this case to glance over the letters of the Adjutant-General, which will be found on page 6449 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and which I have not time to read. The proofs show that while this man was captured and reported as a deserter, numerous others were in like condition, on whose military record to-day there is not the slightest stain or taint.

One man, as appears in this letter, is reported on the muster-roll as having been captured; but on the occasion in question, as is shown by the military records, there was an engagement and a portion of the Federal forces made their escape, which accounts for the entry of "captured" on that muster-roll. It seems from all the records to have been the custom at that time, especially with this particular captain, that where all the men who were engaged were captured and none were left to tell the story, the only entry he could make was that of desertion, whereas in engagements where a portion of the Federal forces escaped to report the engagement, they were reported as having been captured in battle. Nothing is more reasonable; and if you will read this veto message and this report closely, you will find that with the limited investigation had upon this man's military record, the Commissioner of Pensions was thoroughly satisfied as to that record; and the rejection of this claim was based alone upon the question of the dependence of the father upon the son at the time of the son's enlistment and death.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir, I will yield for any question; I want the facts developed. I want to deal fairly with this case and with everybody.

Mr. SOWDEN. If this father was dependent upon his son for support, why did he not apply for a pension until more than ten years after the death of the son upon whom he is alleged to have been dependent?

Mr. TAULBEE. That is a very proper question. I am asked, if this father was dependent upon the son for support, why did he not apply for a pension before 1877? Now, what is shown by the facts in this case? As I stated a while ago, the father had a small amount of property, and as long as there was a dollar of that property left he made no complaint; but in 1867 he had to sell this property to make up the deficit of his support afforded by his earnings; and not until 1876 did he find himself incapable of procuring for himself a support after the property on which he had hitherto drawn had been exhausted. At that time he found himself in such a condition that he was driven to the unpleasant necessity of applying to the Government for support in consequence of the capture and death of his son. As long as he had a dollar of his property he would not complain; but when his entire estate was exhausted, as is shown by the official records of the city of Louisville, then this man, whose noble character as a citizen has been testified to by my colleague [Mr. WILLIS], was driven to the disagreeable necessity, which so many disabled soldiers and bereft parents have to experience, of asking the Government for alms.

On this point I maintain that the claim of this father to a pension was eminently fair and just. The Committee on Invalid Pensions during this session of Congress has reported unanimously a bill now on the Calendar, and which I doubt not will become a law, providing that in case of application from a parent for a pension on the ground of dependence upon a son who lost his life by reason of military service, dependence at the time of the death of the son need not be shown, but present dependence shall authorize the parent or parents to receive a pension. I regard this as one of the fairest and most humane laws that could be passed by this Congress. Suppose the case of a man who at the time of his son's enlistment was worth $20,000, if you please, and who, having lost that bright son in the war, meets afterward with reverses; show me the difference between the son's obligation to his father in that case and the obligation of the son to a father who had nothing at the time of the son's enlistment. You can not make a distinction.

The cases must stand upon the same footing. Numerous pension bills have passed this Congress in cases where the parent at the time of the son's enlistment was not dependent upon him for support, but afterward met with reverses and became dependent. One notable case was that of the widow of an ex-State treasurer of Kentucky, a case in which the bill was introduced by my colleague [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky] and is now a law. The treasurer of our State at the time of his son's enlistment in the Army was amply able to support his family. The son was killed in action; the father died; the estate became wasted; and the mother is now upon the pension-roll by the sanction of both Houses of Congress and the President.

But I call attention to the fact that the President does not put his veto upon any ground with reference to the dependence of the parent. Declaring himself satisfied with the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions on that point, the President bases his veto upon the military record of the son.

Mr. Chairman, there is another and graver question involved in this controversy than that of the relief of this father. Here is the case of a young man who went out to defend his country. You of my colleagues who know something of the privations of war, the hardships of battle, the toil consequent upon military service, know something about the manhood it requires for one to leave his home, enlist in his country's cause, follow the flag to the blazing cannon's mouth and on the reddened field of death. This young man, the pride of his father, the hope of his declining years, was given up as an offering to his country. He went out into the State of Alabama following his flag on and on to victory through faithful days of toil and nights of vigilant watching. But the news came to the old man in Louisville that his son had died in a rebel prison. I doubt not he thinks with pride of that neglected grave. The place of his son's interment is perhaps unknown; but in the distant "potter's field" of Andersonville there sleeps a son the pride of that father and the glory of our country.

Now a question as to his military record is presented. And I believe it to be due to the President of the United States to say that I doubt not he acts conscientiously in these matters and upon his best judgment from the evidence before him. The question of this soldier's desertion from duty is raised. Now, every man who served during the late war, following either the "Stars and Stripes" or the "stars and bars," feels an interest in the good name of every soldier who stood firm to his post of duty and never flinched.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is not a matter with which the President has anything to do.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have exculpated the President from any imputation upon the soundness of his judgment or the integrity of his purposes. I say he had not the facts before him at the time he acted on this case. I remarked in the beginning that with the evidences before him and to be had upon reasonable investigation his action in this matter was defensible.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it would be fair for this House to override the veto of the President upon facts which he had not before him at the time he sent in the veto. In this same connection, I will ask why does not the gentleman introduce a new bill granting a pension in this case, and let us pass it and send it to the President?

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, that is one of the easiest questions the gentleman from New York could ask——

Mr. SPRINGER. But it is hard to answer.

Mr. TAULBEE. My only surprise is he ever asked it. I am called on to state the reason why I do not introduce a new bill nearly at the close of the session, leaving this stigma of desertion against an honorable soldier who gave his life to his country for the privileges we enjoy as citizens and as members of Congress.

Mr. BEACH. We can pass a new bill sooner than we can override the veto of the President.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have been asked why these facts are not made known to the President. I say they are known to the President. I have heard that the Secretary of War submitted these facts to the President after his veto message came to the House. I do not wonder the President does not withdraw his veto; his jurisdiction has ceased so far as that veto is concerned. If he wishes to be consistent he will do as every fair-minded man should—take such action as the facts will justify, and at the same time do justice to this soldier, which the President is as anxious shall be done as any man on this floor, I doubt not.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman this question: I ask him whether or not all the material facts in this case which have been stated on this floor were not accessible to the President in the papers of the case or from the records of the Department?

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the records now incorporated in this report and before the House were accessible to all who would take the trouble to go to the War Department and search, as I did for four long hours, over the musty prison records of the confederacy until I searched out this record.

But the President acted on the written statement of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, who, in response to an inquiry of the Commissioner of Pensions, said there was no such record found in his office. The President could but conclude that was true, and on that statement he acted. But on the evidence our committee had received they believed other records existed, and when written inquiry failed to develop them I went in person. I lost three days from this House nearly entirely devoted to searching those prison records for nearly four hours in one day to find all the facts in order that I might have the Adjutant-General incorporate them in his letter giving this soldier all the benefits he was fairly entitled to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky whether it is true that affidavit of B. H. Bottger, who was captured at the same time as George W. Tiller, was before the President? Was not that part of the record as made up in this pension case? Did he not also have before him the affidavit of J. A. Weatherford, second lieutenant of this man's company, showing Tiller was not a deserter, and that he was captured in the line of duty? Did he not also have before him the affidavit of William E. Benson to the same effect, Benson being captain of the company?

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman is correct. I wish to say further if he will look at the affidavits of Benson and Weatherford, captain and lieutenant of Company A of the same regiment, he will find they do not positively speak of their own personal knowledge as to the capture of this man. Their affidavits must be corroborated, and there must be direct evidence before their testimony can be received with full credibility.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me read.

Mr. TAULBEE. Hold on one moment. So far as Mr. Bottger is concerned he does testify absolutely to the capture. These facts were before the President, but the Commissioner of Pensions required response of the Adjutant-General as to the presence or absence of Bottger, and the answer was that he was not borne on any of the rolls of the Twenty-eighth Regiment. Subsequent investigation of the records found in the Adjutant-General's Office proved that this man is shown by the prison and hospital records to have been captured, and by that testimony as shown in that subsequent document his affidavit is corroborated so as to give him full credence.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But that was not before the President.

Mr. TAULBEE. No; it was not, but was found on subsequent examination.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does not the President in his veto message say, "On the 21st day of July, 1864, he was admitted to the Andersonville hospital, and died the same day of scorbutis?"

Mr. TAULBEE. That is true; but in regard to that the gentleman will pay attention, I hope——

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. TAULBEE. There is no prison record of this man at that date.

The record of Andersonville prison hospital is given; and beyond that the President had no evidence except the testimony of Bottger as to the confinement in that prison, and if you notice, the President was going by the record, which showed that the man deserted September 20, 1863, and was afterward captured. As far as the testimony was before him, that was all that he had; and that, I maintain, sir, is not fully warranted by the record, but is a very reasonable conclusion. The facts of the desertion having been shown by the record, the fact of the confinement in prison a year subsequent, I say, makes the conclusion reasonable that the man was not captured on or about September 20, as claimed, but that he deserted and was captured subsequently. But upon all of the facts I claim that neither the President of the United States nor any other man, I care not how far he may be hostile to pension legislation, in casting his vote in reference to this matter can justify it to his own mind on any other conclusion than that this man was captured in the line of duty, was a victim of the ravages of war, and that he died at or about the time specified.

Mr. FINDLAY. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question? I was not in the House during the course of his remarks, and I ask for information. I would like to know whether the father was dependent upon the son at the time of the son's decease.

Mr. TAULBEE. I think I am justified in saying that he was, from the record. That matter has been discussed fully. I will repeat, however, for the benefit of the gentleman from Maryland, that this man was on the police force of the city of Louisville at $1.75 a day. He owned a little tenement house which was built on leased land in the suburbs of the city, which the testimony shows was worth $250. He kept drawing on that property until 1867, when he was compelled to sell it. He had eaten it up, and his son had contributed to his support during his enlistment. In 1867 or the year after he had to sell the property in order to support himself, and applied for a pension on account of the death of his son.

Mr. FINDLAY. Did the son contribute of the money received by him more money than the father received as his salary for police duty?

Mr. TAULBEE. Oh, no, he did not contribute as much.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The pay of the soldier was very much less.

Mr. TAULBEE. The son did not contribute as much, for at that time the father was a policeman and was getting this compensation, which, with the contributions from his son, was adequate for his support. But it is shown by the testimony of the lieutenant of the company in which the son served that he had carried on two occasions $50 each time from the son to the father.

In 1864 the father was shot through the left arm and entirely through the body, completely disabling him, and from that time to 1885, when he became an absolute mendicant, he was helpless to support himself. Since January 1, 1885, he has been supported by the Odd Fellows and other charitable institutions of the city of Louisville.

Mr. SKINNER. All of that since his son's death?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINDLAY. Under what circumstances was this father shot?

Mr. TAULBEE. In the discharge of his duty as a policeman, from all I can gather.

Mr. FINDLAY. Still we are not pensioning him for that, and it is not perhaps important.

Mr. TAULBEE. Oh, no; we are pensioning him under our system of pensions because he gave to his country's cause one of the grandest, noblest tributes that a father could pay to the country to which he felt patriotic and devoted.

Mr. LONG. At what date was he shot?

Mr. TAULBEE. The date is not given.

Mr. LONG. Was it before or after the death of his son?

Mr. TAULBEE. It was some time in the year 1864, but whether prior to the death of his son or not is only a surmise.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Whether he could state if it was the habit to capture men—that is, on the part of the confederacy—to capture men who had not the insignia of service; in other words, did they capture civilians?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not know, of course, about that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But is it probable?

Mr. TAULBEE. I think not. I yield the remainder of my time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. MATSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the gentleman another question. The son died, as shown by the records, July 21, 1864. Now, is the gentleman able to state whether before or after that time the father was shot through the body?

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, he was shot some time in 1864, but whether it was before or after, I do not know. He had to quit his occupation in 1859 on account of inability to perform manual labor.

Mr. LONG. The relevancy of the question is that it might show the father's dependence upon the son more fully if he was shot before his son's death.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] who introduced the bill—and who is now present, I did not think he was at the time I rose—at his request I will ask that this matter be postponed to be called up hereafter. There are some strong reasons for this that are unnecessary to take the time of the House to state just now.

Mr. WILLIS. I would request my colleague [Mr. TAULBEE] to let this matter go over for three or four days. I believe the object he and I have in view will be accomplished by compliance with this request. The facts are quite voluminous. He has stated them at great length, and I think it is due to the House that these facts should be examined by the House before further action is taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask my colleague in the interest of the bill to let it go over for three days.

Mr. TAULBEE. This request is a little unexpected by me from, the fact that the understanding with my colleague was that this matter should be brought up for consideration this morning.

Mr. WILLIS. That is true.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no interest in this case beyond my desire to see justice done to a worthy claimant and to the military record of a man who gave his life for the liberties we all enjoy. I am at a lost to know what to do; but this claimant being a constituent of my colleague and without due time to deliberate as to what would be the best to do, under those circumstances I shall certainly agree to his request; but it is with some reluctance I do it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. As I understand, the request is made by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions——

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. Gentlemen who remain in their seats can not understand what is going on, on account of the confusion made by the gentlemen standing around in the aisles.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not agree to this proposed postponement. The session draws near to its close. We are familiar with every fact in the case, and I think it is due to these questions before the House that we go on and dispose of them.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rose to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My inquiry is, whether when the President has vetoed a bill, when that bill has been sent to the proper committee, when that proper committee by its action has directed a given member to call it up and present it to the House, when in accordance with that action the member has called it up and presented it to the House and it has been discussed—under those circumstances my inquiry is, whether it is competent for any gentleman to deprive the House of its constitutional right to pass upon the veto of the President. Can it be done except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will respond to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas by stating that this bill was called up by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], who is a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and it was a privileged question. But this House by a majority can postpone the further consideration of the bill if it desires to do so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I submit that when the bill has been brought before the House it can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in possession of the House, and the House can postpose the further consideration of it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. On the motion to postpone I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope my friend will not insist upon the yeas and nays. What we ask is that the further consideration shall be postponed until Friday.

Mr. JACKSON. A statement of the case having been made on one side, it is entirely fair that those who do not agree with that side of the case should have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If there is a postponement, will not that involve a change of the rule which requires more than a majority vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have requested the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has stated——

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is not debatable. The question is on that motion, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. If the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana to postpone the consideration of this bill is carried will it not lose its privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope gentlemen will not ask for the yeas and nays on this question. It will only take up time unnecessarily. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I insist on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to be called up hereafter at any time; and on that question the gentleman from Kansas asks the yeas and nays.

Mr. MATSON. My motion is that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till Friday next.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to meet this issue fairly and immediately.

Mr. RYAN. Let us meet it now.

The SPEAKER here resumed the chair, and having requested members to take their seats, said: The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to postpone the further consideration of this subject till next Friday. On that question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the motion to postpone till Friday shall prevail would this matter come up then without any further motion?

The SPEAKER. It would. It is a privileged matter at any time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 113, not voting 93; as follows:

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I was about entering from the corridor when my name was called, but I was unable to get through the doorway in time. I do not know whether under the rules I am entitled to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] states that he was in the corridor and about entering the Hall when his name was called, and he asks leave to vote.

A MEMBER. What is the rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule is that a gentleman must answer to his name on either the first or the second roll-call, but that rule has been relaxed in the practice of the House so as to permit gentlemen to vote when they state that they were in the Hall but failed to hear their names called.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that if I had rushed through the doorway I might have got into the Hall in time to justify me in making that statement.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule had better be executed.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If permitted to vote, Mr. Speaker, I should have recorded my vote in the negative.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I was in the Hall during the roll-call, but did not hear my name. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi states that he was in the Hall during the roll-call, but did not hear his name called, and that he now desires to vote. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I vote ay.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Several members objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. If this bill is postponed now, will it come up as a matter of privilege on Friday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that it will.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Then I wish to change my vote from no to ay.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.
Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. RIGGS with Mr. WHITNEY.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. OWEN.
Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. DAVENPORT.
Mr. COLE with Mr. BRADY.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. HISCOCK, until July 9.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. HOPKINS.
Mr. SHAW with Mr. JAMES.
Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. BUCHANAN.
Mr. MILLER with Mr. LEHLBACH.
Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. STEELE.
Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, with Mr. REED, of Maine.
Mr. SNYDER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have heard my name read as paired with Mr. HEARD. I was not informed that I had been paired, and therefore I have voted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk advises the Chair that the pair reads "until further notice," and that no notice has been given of its termination.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But I never was informed of the pair at all. However, in courtesy to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] I will withdraw my vote, provided it makes no difference in the result.

The SPEAKER. It will make no difference.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

DANIEL J. BINGMAN.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. BURNES. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the resolution which the gentleman from Michigan desires to offer relates to a bill which has passed both the House and the Senate, granting a pension to a certain claimant who has since had his pension granted in the Pension Office. The gentleman from Michigan therefore desires to withdraw the bill from the President.

Mr. BURROWS. The pension has not been granted, Mr. Speaker, but the ground on which it was previously rejected by the Pension Office has been reconsidered by the office and declared to be without foundation. I therefore desire to have the bill suspended until the Pension Office shall have acted on the case, and this is the last day when I can have that done.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be respectfully requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill of the House 3501, granting a pension to Daniel J. Bingman.

The resolution was adopted.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN M. ROBESON.

Mr. RICHARDSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment to the bill of the Senate.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
J. LYMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN H. MITCHELL,
GEO. GRAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement accompanying the report of the committee of conference was read:

The claimant in this case, John M. Robeson, now deceased, was the owner of a foundry in Independence, Mo., during the late war between the States. His foundry was taken possession of by the United States Army in the year 1862, and the same was used in this way for some months. The claimant asks for $18,220 for his property taken and used by the Army, and some of which was destroyed. The Senate found that the property of claimant so taken and used amounted in value to $1,000, which was made up of three items, as follows: 5 tons of wrought iron, $500; 3 sets of smiths' tools, $300, and seasoned lumber, $200; total, $1,000. The bill, having passed the Senate, was pending in the House, and was amended by striking out the amounts allowed in the two items, smiths' tools $300 and seasoned lumber $200, making $500, and the bill as passed by the House only allowed $500 for the wrought iron. The conferees on the part of the House are of opinion that claimant should be allowed compensation for the items of smiths' tools and seasoned lumber, amounting to $500, and they therefore have recommended that the House should recede from its amendment, being satisfied all of said property thus allowed for was taken and used by the Army.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
J. LYMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON HON. MICHAEL HAHN.

Mr. BURNES. I rise to move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, but I yield for a moment to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. WALLACE], who wishes to submit a matter relating to a deceased member.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution, to which, I think, when the Clerk has read it, there will be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution providing for printing the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Michael Hahn, a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Michael Hahn, a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Louisiana, 12,500 copies; of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives. And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Michael Hahn to accompany said eulogies; and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 199) was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WALLACE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I ask permission to make a report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has moved to dispense with the morning hour.

The regular order was demanded.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURNES, there were—ayes 102, noes 19.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania). Withdraw the point.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. All I ask is to make a report. It will not take a minute.

The tellers were ordered; and Mr. BURNES and Mr. BROWN of Pennsylvania were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 145, nays 21.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. BURNES was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon the following amendment, submitted yesterday by Mr. BUTTERWORTH:

At the end of line 45, page 110 of the bill, insert the following:

"To pay the Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $5,333.33; to the City Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $3,000; to the American Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $5,744.52; to the National Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $3,000; to the Central Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $3,000; to the Eureka Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $4,574.19; to the Citizens' Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $1,744.52; to the American Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $1,744.52; to the Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $2,287.10; to the City Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $287.10; to the American Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, $4,667."

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] a point of order was reserved by the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, when this amendment was offered last evening, just before the Committee of the Whole rose, my friend from Missouri reserved a point of order against the amendment. I do not know whether he did so from force of habit or whether he was serious. If he insists on the point of order, I would be glad to hear upon what it is based.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any law authorizing this amendment, unless we go back to some principle of the common law and by argument conclude that the provision is thereby authorized. If the gentleman from Ohio is aware of the law upon which this proposed appropriation is based he can readily present it; and when he shall have submitted it, I will allow the Chair to pass upon it without any further argument.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman from Missouri takes his seat, I wish to ask him whether the present Comptroller has not rejected these accounts?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. This bill, as I understand, provides simply for judgments and audited accounts, not for controverted claims.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not hear what the gentleman from Georgia said.

Mr. BLOUNT. I asked whether it was not true that the present Comptroller has examined these accounts and determined against them?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not also true that in this bill simply judgments and audited accounts are paid, not claims, so that on this bill the amendment is not in order?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will state to my friend that these claims were heretofore examined, audited, and reported for payment, and a part of them was paid by the last Congress. But without authority and without jurisdiction some of them were returned to the present Comptroller, who proceeded to re-examine them and reports against their payment.

Mr. BLOUNT. How are we to determine the matter? Does the gentleman want us to assume that the Comptroller was not doing his duty in examining the accounts? I take it the presumption is the other way.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I assume that by an examination of the law we are to judge for ourselves whether the House has jurisdiction to do what it is asked to do in this case.

Now, in answer to my friend from Missouri I will say that these are claims of several insurance companies which were audited and a part of which was paid by the last Congress. I have heretofore brought them to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, who I presume are familiar with them. They were reported in the Book of Estimates to the Forty-eighth Congress; and a portion of them having been paid, these come over to this Congress, with an adverse finding I admit, by the Comptroller. I can not conceive that the amendment is subject to any point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must understand the Chair knows nothing about this matter whatever.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that under a provision of law, the statute of 1849, revised and re-enacted 1864, it was provided that all horses and other property, including steamboats, which should be taken and used by the Government, by impressment or charter in cases when the property should be lost or destroyed while in the service of the United States should be paid for at its value.

It was the act of March 3, 1849, as amended by the act of March 3, 1863; and it now appears as section 3483 of the Revised Statutes.

During the years 1863–'64 certain steamboats belonging to citizens of Cincinnati and that locality were impressed into the service of the United States. They were lost in the service, not destroyed by the enemy, but lost by accident while plying on the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi, either burned while in the service or sunk on snags in the river.

Claims were presented to the Quartermaster's Department, the proper department of the Government, and under statute authorizing investigation and determination of amounts due to such claimants, and the amounts due to these several parties were ascertained. The amounts were paid less the insurance which the claimants had received from the underwriters who had insured their boats prior to or about the time of their entering the service. These claims were adjudicated by the Auditor and Comptroller of the War Department and reported to Congress for allowance in Executive Document No. 153, I think. A part of them were paid, as will appear by reference to the appropriation bill of last Congress.

Subsequent to that time the question was again raised as to whether these claims had been properly allowed. Several points were made to the Secretary of the Treasury. (I am running over the whole case, Mr. Chairman, so you may know the whole of it.) They were again referred to the Secretary of the Treasury to be examined de novo by the Comptroller, the First or Second Comptroller, as the case may be. He made examination of the case and reached a different conclusion from that which had been reached by his predecessor. And while they had been reported, a large part of them, to the previous Congress and paid in part, on re-examination they were rejected.

Although they are reported in the executive document I hold in my hand, with the opinion of the Comptroller that they should not be paid, I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary a report should be favorable in order to give this House jurisdiction to act on them. Under a resolution of this Congress all these claims were reported to this House, all of them. In the executive document which I have in my hand is found also the adverse report of the Comptroller now in charge of this class of claims. Of course the fact that they have been reported adversely upon does not take away the jurisdiction of this House. This is a deficiency bill because there was no money heretofore appropriated to pay these audited and approved claims. These claims against the Government were adjudicated by a tribunal expressly charged with the performance of that duty. They were allowed and paid in part, but there was not a sufficient sum to pay them all. Hence they are reported again to be provided for in the deficiency bill.

One word touching this review of these claims by the present Comptroller. I may as well, if the Chair pleases, refer to it now. It is this: So far as this review is concerned these cases were res adjudicata. The statute in express terms so provides. In referring them again to the Comptroller the Secretary of the Treasury acted without jurisdiction. The statute in plain terms forbids him from exercising any such jurisdiction with reference to this class of claims. The statute points out the manner of review—by whom it may be ordered—and the language is too clear to be misapprehended.

In other words, the claims in question might have been reviewed on the suggestion of the Secretary of War under the plain language of the statute, but not at the request or order of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the statute is too plain in that behalf for any man familiar with legal construction to entertain a doubt. That question was expressly raised, and the Attorney-General had distinctly decided, as has also the Court of Claims, that these cases were res adjudicata. I do not mean these particular cases now in controversy, but cases on all fours with them, and that there could be no review except upon the request of the head of the Department under the administration of which these claims originated and were audited and settled, in this case by the Secretary of War.

I only refer to this to show that these claims have been reviewed without authority of law, and this report of the Comptroller cuts no more figure here than would the report or opinion of any other able gentleman competent to advise Congress in any behalf. That Congress has the reviewing power I do not question; but that the Secretary of the Treasury had the right to review or to direct the review is settled by the very language of the statute itself, a few lines of which I desire to read to the Chair. I do not know that in the decision of the question of order it will cut any figure, but if it does I would like it to be before the Chair.

Now, as I have stated, if the Chair pleases, these claims covered by the amendment were reviewed and an adverse report rendered, but without authority as I insist; and under the language of the statute itself they are res adjudicata, the statute providing that the question of the liability of the Government in such case shall not be raised by a head of an Executive Department, but that they may review the case in the manner pointed out in the statute, beyond which there is no review except by Congress or by the courts. Without doubt we are a law unto ourselves, and often abuse our privilege, I may add.

Touching this power of the Secretary of the Treasury to review the adjudications of the class of claims covered by my amendment, I wish to read from the Opinions of the Attorney-General, on page 17 of this document, which I hold in my hand:

> Accordingly, in so far as section 191 applies to the heads of Departments, the legal effect produced thereby is simply this: It prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from changing or modifying the balances appearing upon the certificates of the First Comptroller and Commissioner of Customs, whereof copies have been transmitted to him by the Register; it prohibits the Secretary of War, from changing or modifying the balances certified to him by the Second Comptroller, and so with respect to other heads of Departments to whom balances may be certified by the Comptroller.
> But it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, where balances are certified by the First Comptroller and Commissioner, upon the transmission of copies of the certificates to him of the Register, and before issuing a warrant for any of such balances, to submit any facts in his judgment affecting the correctness of the balance to the Comptroller or the Commissioner, as the case may be, and the decision of the Comptroller or Commissioner thereon is to be final and conclusive as far as the executive branch of the Government is concerned. So where a balance is certified by the Second Comptroller to the Secretary of War, it authorizes the latter, before issuing a requisition for such balance, to submit any facts which, in his judgment, affect the correctness of the balance to the Second Comptroller, whose decision thereon is, in like manner, to be final and conclusive. And so with the other heads of Departments.

And it says the same thing with reference to the Secretary of War, that it was competent for him to direct that the review or re-examination which has been transmitted to the House should be made, but it was not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to do that thing. Hence this——

Mr. BURNES. May I interrupt my colleague for a moment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Ohio, my colleague on the committee, has alluded to the decisions of the Auditor and Comptroller, and has declared that the adjudication of these cases is in the nature of a final settlement. In other words, that they were res adjudicata. Now, if that be a true proposition I wish to call the gentleman's attention, because I do not want to be unfair to him, to the fact that the Auditor and the Comptroller in 1866 and 1867 considered these claims and decided against them; and the claimants slept on these decisions for years and years. Their successors did not consider that a thing adjudicated; and so they took up the cases again and had them allowed under a new decision notwithstanding this previous adjudication. Then, under the statute, the Secretary of the Treasury was appealed to, and he had the authority to authorize the Second Comptroller to re-investigate the second allowance after the first defeat; and upon that order of the Secretary of the Treasury the re-examination was had and the claims were decided adversely. So they have been decided against twice; once in 1866, and again in 1886.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The first controversy grew out of the relation of the assured to the insurance companies, and the examination resulted in the finding which I claim to be final, a finding which was directed by an officer having jurisdiction to order the adjudication and review, and not by an officer not having jurisdiction in that behalf. The difference is, as I maintain, that in one case the proceeding was carried forward in accordance with authority of law and the finding made on that authority; whereas in the other case it was an adjudication without any authority whatever.

Now, in 1866, if my friend had investigated the matter, he would have ascertained that there was a question as to how far the Government might be liable, or how far the owners might claim as against the Government. I speak now of a fact dehors the record, but pertinent in this connection.

In view of the fact that the losses were covered in large part by insurance, this is an attempt on the part of the insurance companies to be subrogated, as under the law, with which you are all familiar, they had a right to be subrogated to the rights of the assured, and recover from the Government that which the owners might have recovered had there been no insurance at all.

In other words, where the owner of a boat was insured to the amount of $10,000 and his boat was worth $20,000 he recovered of the Government $10,000 and recovered of the insurance company $10,000. Then the insurance company having a right to be subrogated to all the rights of the insured, and the Government having stipulated to pay the value of that boat if it should be lost on the river, the insurance company asks the Government to keep its promise and pay to the insurance company, that company having been subrogated to the rights of the insured, just as it would have had to pay to the owner of the boat if there had been no insurance whatever.

These claims grew out of that, and are simply an attempt on the part of several insurance companies of Cincinnati and other places to be subrogated to the right of the insured, a right as old as any other principle known in the administration of public justice under a system of jurisprudence which has any savor of equity in it. In other words, there rested on the Government an obligation to pay the value of these boats if lost. To whom they paid it was of no consequence to the Government, so that it owed the debt and the parties who sustained the loss appeared as claimants, whether as insurance companies or as the owners of the boat. The question as to whom the payment should be made was of no consequence to the Government, which stipulated to pay the value of the boat in case it was lost.

On the point of order I do not go into the merits of the question.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a point which I regard as absolutely sufficient to justify sustaining the point of order. The law under which claims like this come to the House of Representatives reads as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report the amount due each claimant at the commencement of each session to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the claim before Congress for consideration.

I submit that although under the former so-called adjudication these claims were sent to a preceding Congress, they have not been sent, as the law requires, to this Congress, because they came here with an adverse report and are not sent here with a recommendation of their payment. They are not then before the Forty-ninth Congress under the requirements of the law that governs in this matter.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will ask my colleague from Missouri if he is aware these claims were sent here in response to a request of this House? That is the way they came. I have the resolution here.

Mr. BURNES. They came in the general report from the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This came here in response to the request of this House under a resolution which I hold in my hand.

Mr. LONG. How is it of any consequence how this matter comes before the House? Even if it comes in the form of an amendment introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], the simple question on which the point of order turns is whether there is any law authorizing the payment of these claims. That law will be found in the section of the statutes which I presume the Chair has before him, section 3483, which provides for the payment of this class of losses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think very likely the Chair sees the exact point involved, but if the Chair has had no occasion to examine the subject before, it may be the real question presented may not at once appear. The Chair, I believe, has before him the statute under which this claim is set out. It is epitomized in this language by the Second Comptroller:

In the case of the loss or destruction of a vessel the statute creates a liability on the part of the Government in two classes of cases, first, where the vessel is captured or destroyed by an enemy, or is abandoned or destroyed by the order of the commanding general or other proper military authority, while the property is in the military service, either by impressment or contract; secondly, where the vessel is lost or destroyed by unavoidable accident while in the service.

These vessels, to the extent the owner was interested in them, were the subject of the claim paid by the Government, and I presume the fact was the Government deducted the amount covered by insurance.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is true.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the question before the Second Comptroller and before Congress has been whether the insuring party was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the owner of the vessel. The Chair observes the fact that in the report which comes to us in answer to the resolution which has been referred to it appears the subject had undergone a full investigation. It would be tedious to go over the opinions in detail, but I will present two or three points to show the exact state of the case.

It appears that some of them—

Standing on the same footing—

which were probably regarded as test cases, were first brought before the Auditor and Second Comptroller in 1866 and 1867, and a decision was then made by the Auditor and the Comptroller in the case of the Eureka Fire Insurance Company—

One of the parties before the Comptroller—for loss sustained by the destruction of the steamer Champion, disallowing the claims. An able and elaborate opinion was filed by the Second Comptroller December 14, 1866, in which he reached the general conclusion that insurance companies which had paid losses upon steamboats destroyed while in the military service, by impressment or contract, had no lawful claim against the Government for reimbursement on account of such payments.

This decision was delivered in 1866. It seems to have been final; but during the last Congress the following appears to have occurred:

For some reason, which the papers on file in the cases that I have examined do not disclose, these claims were subsequently taken up by the accounting officers, their former decision overruled, and allowances made aggregating $94,873.61.

This occurred in the last Congress, and Congress declined to allow the amount. Then the report proceeds to say:

The Secretary of the Treasury has caused all the certificates and accompanying papers to be returned to the Second Comptroller, under section 191 of the Revised Statutes, submitting to that officer facts which in his judgment affect the correctness of the certificates and the balances found due, and, pursuant to the authority conferred by that section, I have re-examined all these claims upon their merits, and reached the conclusion that the United States is not lawfully indebted to any of these claimants on account of the matters set forth in their respective claims or upon the facts proven in each case.

It concludes as follows:

If the laws are not covered by the policy, then, as we have seen in the other cases, the claimants have not brought their cases within the provisions of the act of 1849.

That is the same act which is referred to as amended in 1863 and 1864.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But let me remind my friend that Congress at the last session did pay $42,973 of these claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. But these claims which are now presented here were disallowed.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has said a good deal about some of these claims having been paid, allow me to say in answer, that in the documents sent to the Forty-eighth Congress there appeared, under the head of the "Allowance for horses," some of these items, intermixed with smaller ones, and they escaped the observation of the committee and were unwittingly included in the bill. It will be remembered that there was an immense number of items in that part of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. In any event, Mr. Chairman, it is very manifest that the attention of the House was not called to the subject, because it was never discussed either in the Committee of the Whole or in the committee from which the bill came.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That relates to the merits of the case, not to the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to lay down a single proposition. If these claims are to be regarded as deficiencies for which an appropriation should be made, it must be only upon the ground of their coming down to the House as audited claims. Certainly it can not be assumed that a claim against the Government would be entitled to be considered a deficiency unless it was either a deficiency in fact in a current appropriation or unless it approximated to that and was constructively a deficiency, in that it was certified as an allowed claim by a Department of the Government without funds to meet it. I submit that either of these two states of things must exist to entitle these claims to go into an appropriation bill as a deficiency. Now, these do not come to the House as audited claims; on the contrary, they come here as rejected claims.

I submit, therefore, that it is clear beyond all question, if any line is to be drawn between a mere claim upon the Government and a deficiency, that these fall within the class of claims which are cognizable under the rules of the House by the Committee on Claims and not within the deficiencies in the appropriations to carry on the Government, and therefore entitled to a place in this appropriation bill. In any possible view of the matter I think it must be held that these are simply claims, not deficiencies, claims resting possibly upon equity, but cognizable, as I have said, only by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish my friend would point me to any rule of this House which draws the line of demarkation that he suggests. All the claims audited under the section of the statute to which attention has been called are deficiencies, there being no appropriation to pay them.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are deficiencies only by implication. They are assumed to be deficiencies because they are audited by a Department of the Government, and because there are no funds to pay them. That is the reason why they are treated as deficiencies. But these do not come here as audited claims; they come as rejected claims.

Mr. BLOUNT. Under the rules and practice of the House in dealing with a deficiency bill I think it will be conceded that it is not proper to place upon such a bill any matter which is a mere claim, which is not fully settled, which has not passed beyond the region of debate. It has been usual to insert in deficiency bills judgments and audited accounts; but wherever the House has gone beyond that it has done so unwittingly, in consequence of the matter not having been properly presented and discussed. Keeping this in view, what is the condition of these claims or, if you please, audited accounts? It appears that in 1866 and 1867 they were audited and rejected. It appears that subsequently—I read from the report of the Second Comptroller:

For some reason that the papers on file which I have examined do not disclose these claims are subsequently taken up by the examining officers, their former decisions overruled, and allowances made aggregating $94,873.31. The claims were reported to Congress by the former Secretary of the Treasury, but that body omitted to make any appropriation for their payment. In some of these cases the certificates are incomplete, not specifying the parties to whom the moneys are due and payable. The Secretary of the Treasury, construing section 191 (which the gentleman from Ohio regards of so much value in this matter), has caused all the certificates and accompanying papers to be returned to the Second Comptroller under section 191 of the Revised Statutes, submitting to that officer facts which in his judgment affect the correctness of the certificates and the balances found due (which the latter part of section 191 expressly provides for). Pursuant to the authority conferred by that section, I have re-examined all these claims upon their merits, and reached the conclusion that the United States is not lawfully indebted to any one of these claimants on account of the matters set forth in their respective claims or upon the facts proven in each case.

That is the attitude in which these claims stand to-day. There is the issue raised as to whether or not these claims should be paid. This being the case, it seems to me the Chair should not hesitate to say, "I will not entertain them under such circumstances." But, says the gentleman from Ohio, "under section 191 of the Revised Statutes it was not competent for the present Comptroller to review the action of his predecessors." Is that proposition correct? If so, the gentleman is not at all relieved, but is equally embarrassed by the fact that the ruling upon which he relies was a revision of a prior decision made by the accounting officers of the Treasury, a revision which he declares it was not competent for them to make. Therefore, if the gentleman's construction is correct, these accounts come here as though they were unqualifiedly condemned by all the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Now, the gentleman ventures a declaration to the Chair that he proposes later on to examine this question on the merits. That is what the rule intended the gentleman should not do—what the committee should not do. It was intended that there should be no re-examination of accounts—no questioning in this Committee of the Whole upon a deficiency bill as to whether or not there was merit in a claim.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me say to the gentleman that the authority is specially reserved to Congress (if such a thing were necessary) to review these findings.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not speak of what may be done by Congress. There is a distinction here. Congress may review these findings; but the question is whether under the rules of the House it is permissible to review them on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We do that on every item we vote upon. Every item comes up on its merits.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then if the gentleman is correct the accepted practice of this House is all for naught. The gentleman's declaration is against the light of the experience we all have in this matter. The practice of this House which determines the nature of this bill is a wise one, and has always been sustained, and I trust that the present occupant of the chair, in the face of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has sent here the opinion of an accounting officer of the Treasury declaring that these claims have been examined and rejected on their merits under a section of the Revised Statutes will not plunge this House into a consideration of these questions. The very suggestion of the Treasury Department that the claims have been rejected ought to be enough to determine the action of the Chair in excluding this doubtful matter from consideration at all by the Committee of the Whole on a deficiency bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, a good deal of stress has been laid by the other side upon the statement that this is a claim. Suppose it were admitted to be a claim. If the question were before the House as to what committee the matter should be referred to, the Chair would say it should go to the Committee on Claims, not to the Committee on Appropriations. But in this particular case, even if the matter were a claim, and were offered in the form of an amendment to this deficiency bill, the only question which the Chair would ask upon the point of order would be, is there authority of law for the payment of this claim? In other words, I take the broad ground that I may present as an amendment to any general appropriation bill any claim whatever; and if there be authority of law for its payment, then under the rule the amendment is in order. Now, there is authority of law under section 3483 for the payment of losses of horses and steamers. It seems to me that is the simple question here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that cases of the class to which he refers are always embraced in a separate appropriation bill, are reported from the Committee on War Claims, and are not in any sense privileged, but stand exactly upon the same basis with other war claims. They are never embraced in general appropriation bills except by unanimous consent. The matters here presented are simply claims against the Government; and even if they had been audited by the Treasury Department for allowance they could not be placed upon a general appropriation bill except by unanimous consent, because it has been the universal practice to treat them as claims.

What are the matters which should be put upon general appropriation bills? The rule prescribes them very plainly; the matter is not one of doubt. Rule XI provides that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating,

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided, namely: For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies: to the Committee on Appropriations.

This committee has no jurisdiction to consider any claim against the Government except such claims as relate to the ordinary expenditures and the providing of revenue for the support of the Government.

The circumstances out of which these claims arise occurred many years ago—twenty-five years ago, I understand. They are not only claims, but old and stale claims.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman will allow me to say that these are claims growing out of an expenditure authorized by law, because the Quartermaster-General was authorized to impress these vessels; and the statute provides that in such cases the claims shall be audited and reported to the House. These claims have pursued just that course. Having been audited, they are reported to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. They are authorized by law, just as every war claim is a claim authorized by law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. The law authorizes the military officers in the field to take possession of property and to give vouchers for it, and claims for property so taken are valid claims against the Government; they are regarded as regular and legitimate; but they have never been put upon general appropriation bills. That is the point I make. We are now considering a bill which makes appropriations for the support of the Government or to supply deficiencies where the ordinary appropriations have not been sufficient.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Exactly; where the ordinary appropriations fall short. In other words, this appropriation is necessary to meet obligations of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. But these were not expenses connected with the support of the Government in its ordinary capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to dispose of the question. [Cries of "Decision!"] The Chair thinks the amendment is out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of clerks, United States courts, 1883 and prior years, $318.25.

Mr. BURNES. I move to insert the following amendment to cover payments the estimates for which have come in since the bill was printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Claims allowed by the First Auditor and Commissioner of Customs:

For furniture and repairs, same for public buildings, 1883 and prior years, $76.20.

For furniture and repairs, same for public buildings, 1884, $124.26.

For salaries of keepers of light-houses, 1883 and prior years, $50.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 50 per cent. of arrears of army transportation due certain land-grant railroads, 1883 and prior years, $1,331.54.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend by adding after line 135, page 116, as a new paragraph, the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of claim No. 4377, and certified as due by Comptroller in Schedule A, page 22, Executive Document No. 210, in favor of the Hoboken Land Improvement Company, $15,800.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order that Schedule A has been considered in the Committee of the Whole and passed on. (See page 110 of the bill.)

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not hear the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. He makes the point of order that this has been already considered and passed upon by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not urge that point of order. This claim has special merit. It has been passed upon favorably by the last Comptroller as well as by the present Comptroller. I was absent from my place when the proposition on page 110 was passed.

I will make the further remark that in my opinion the point of order is not well taken. A claim of this kind can not be ruled out simply on a technicality that a certain schedule has been passed. It would please me better if the gentleman from Missouri would not urge a point of order of that character.

The CHAIRMAN. As it is intimated to the Chair this may come in at the close of the bill the Chair will for the present sustain the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. While I would like to accommodate my friend, if I should attempt in so plain a case to grant the favor he asks, I would be obliged to grant every request of the same kind. On page 110 this particular item was excepted and passed upon specially and particularly. Therefore a reconsideration of the action of the committee certainly can not be in order at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say my amendment may be offered hereafter?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware at the time that this matter had already been determined on page 110, where it was specially in order. The committee having passed that portion of the bill, it, of course, is not in order to return to it now.

Mr. LONG. That only is an exception of this item which has never been considered at all, but on the contrary has been specially excepted from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It would have been in order at that place and time to have stricken out that exception. As that part of the bill has been passed it is not in order, if objected to, now to return to it.

Mr. LONG. That would have been true if this had not been specially excepted by the terms of the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that that portion of the bill has been considered and passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE SIXTH AUDITOR.

For compensation of postmasters readjusted under act of March 3, 1883, payable from deficiency in postal revenues, 1883 and prior years, $39,674.07.

Mr. BURNES. I move to strike out that paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Chauncey C. Morse, mail-contractor, for amount of transportation from April 1 to June 30, 1882, route numbered 28337, Missouri, $23.25. .

Mr. WINANS. I move, after line 198, to insert the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Flint and Pere Marquette Railroad Company, for additional transportation, per order of Postmaster-General, No. 621, $14,394.68.

Mr. BURNES. I raise on that amendment the same point of order decided a while ago, that this item has been already passed upon by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WINANS. I think this matter has not been considered at all, but excepted from consideration. I know of no good reason why it should be excepted. It is a deficiency submitted by the Comptroller. Others in the same category have been paid. What good reason there should be for its exception does not appear.

There seems to have been no consideration of this matter; and, therefore, I think the point of order is not good.

This, Mr. Chairman, provides for additional transportation, which arises out of the law of Congress passed in 1876, authorizing or directing the Postmaster-General to reduce the compensation for transportation of the mails.

In a suit that was brought by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company (United States Reports, 104, page 680), it was held by the Supreme Court that this railroad company is entitled to recover the contract price. These were land-grant companies—and it was held that a contract for carrying the mails, a specific contract, entitled them to have the full contract price.

Mr. HOLMAN. By whom was that held?

Mr. WINANS. It was held in this opinion, delivered in the case of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company against The United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the Court of Claims?

Mr. WINANS. Yes, sir, originally; but sustained, on an appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court; and the Supreme Court held that the company was entitled to recover the contract price for the service.

Now, this additional transportation, which is had under that decision, comes to us in the shape of a deficiency estimate by the Sixth Auditor, as will be seen by an examination of page 275 of the Book of Estimates. I can see, therefore, no good reason why the claim should not be paid, nor can I see any reason why it should not be provided for in this bill; and hence the point of order can not prevail. The gentleman makes the point of order, as I understand it, that this section has been passed. I find that it has been excepted, and that there has been no consideration of it. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will not object to the consideration of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Missouri that the excepted claims are excepted by numbers. The Chair does not know whether they embrace the amendment now proposed or not.

Mr. BURNES. They embrace specifically the very amendment of the gentleman. This proposition has been already excepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman concede that his claim is covered by one of these numbers?

Mr. WINANS. I think that is true, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is good.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the direction of the committee the Clerk will now return to that part of the bill which was passed over by consent.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. By agreement of the gentleman from Missouri in charge of the bill, I ask consent now to go back to the paragraph which was passed over at my request.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to suggest that we go back to the beginning of the bill, and will reach my friend from Tennessee as we come forward again.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. That will suit me very well.

Mr. CANNON. As we are to go back now to the beginning of the bill, in pursuance of the agreement, I ask recognition of the Chair for general debate upon this provision relating to the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when this portion of the bill was passed over there was some agreement reached as to general debate; but the Chair would like to be informed by the gentleman in charge of the bill what that agreement was.

Mr. BURNES. I am at a loss to understand what agreement my friend refers to. I do not remember any agreement with reference to general debate. As a matter of course, if there is anything to be debated, it would be well to have some understanding, and particularly with the gentleman from Illinois. But I desire to state that it will expedite business if the gentleman will be satisfied to take such time as he may desire when the emergency arises. My impression is that nearly all of the first pages may be disposed of upon points of order; and it is unnecessary to discuss irrelevant questions, especially as we are now in need of all the time that we have at our disposal. At all events, let it be understood that the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to such time as he wants; and I know the committee has been liberal to my friend and will be, and I will consent that he shall have such time as he wants when the emergency arises.

Mr. CANNON. Touching these items of the State Department, I desire to say that I can much more satisfactorily debate the question which I desire to discuss at this time and consecutively. I do not want to be recognized a dozen times to make one speech. I would prefer to begin and conclude it now.

Mr. BURNES. What I want to suggest to my friend is that perhaps the very item he proposes to discuss may go out on a point of order; and therefore, after having the points of order passed upon, the gentleman can determine what subject he deems necessary to have general debate upon.

Mr. CANNON. That may seem well to the gentleman from Missouri; but these items under the head of the State Department, as they now stand, and no general debate ever having been had upon them, will form the subject upon which I desire to be heard.

Mr. BURNES. I think in view of the proposition I made to my colleague it could not be claimed that I am unreasonable; and I must insist upon the point that the argument should not be upon propositions or the criticism of portions of the bill that may go out on points of order. Let us get through with that first.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not know and can not know what my line of argument is to be or what I shall speak on.

Mr. BURNES. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON. I merely rise in my place as a member of the committee demanding to be recognized for general debate, none having been had upon this section of the bill, and that was the agreement and the only agreement by which the bill was allowed to be considered before the general debate was closed.

Mr. BURNES. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, but I submit to him that he should not desire to argue propositions that may never come up for consideration. After we shall have passed on the points of order with regard to these propositions I pledge him, so far as I am able to do, any amount of time he may require on the questions before the committee which may be left in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. It suits me better to have debate as we ordinarily have debates, instead of postponing it till after the questions are disposed of.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I submit to my honorable friend from Missouri that the understanding was that we might revert to this part of the bill with the view of considering it as my colleague [Mr. CANNON] suggests. I think it only fair that my colleague should have the opportunity for debate which he desires. It will not consume much time, I am sure.

Mr. BURNES. I only ask what is reasonable, that the gentleman from Illinois shall withhold his argument until he knows what is to be argued about.

Mr. CANNON. I prefer to make my argument before the bill is disposed of, adopting the same course as we do with regard to all other bills.

Mr. BELMONT. These matters which the gentleman from Illinois desires to debate referred to the State Department. I can not but concur with the gentleman from Missouri that the most satisfactory manner of dealing with them is to discuss them in order as the bill is read.

Mr. CANNON. It suits my purpose to discuss them before the bill is read, and I have the right to so discuss them in general debate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think there need be no misapprehension about this thing——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been permitting this colloquy to go on with unanimous consent with the idea that it might save time by some understanding being arrived at.

Mr. BURNES. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] say how much time he wants?

Mr. CANNON. I think I can conclude what I have to say in thirty minutes or perhaps in fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURNES. Will the gentleman then say fifteen minutes?

Mr. CANNON. I will say thirty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. Say twenty.

Mr. CANNON. I prefer thirty.

Mr. BURNES. You will not yield anything?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And then gentlemen on the other side can have what time they desire.

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman from Illinois says I made any promise on the subject, as a matter of course I will stand by it.

Mr. CANNON. The RECORD will show for itself what the fact is. General debate on this part of the bill has not been closed.

Mr. BURNES. I am willing to yield half an hour to the gentleman. And as the gentleman from Ohio has said we might have what we desire on this side, I would suggest that we may take thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked——

Mr. CANNON. I did not ask this by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not decide the matter of right without consulting the RECORD.

Mr. RYAN. The proposition was to close general debate after one hour shall have been occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] proposes that debate be allowed to run on these paragraphs before reading them for one hour—one-half hour to the gentlemen on the left, and one-half to the gentlemen on the right—and then that general debate shall be closed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. The omissions of appropriations for salary in the diplomatic service, being a deficiency for the years 1885 and 1886 in this bill as reported by the committee, are most extraordinary. I would not have claimed the right to have general debate even for a short time were it not that under the practice of the Committee on Appropriations, generally presenting their bills near the close of the session, minority reports are not submitted, so that the report made in this instance by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] would appear on its face to be the report of the whole committee, and in the absence of a minority report would appear to bind the whole committee. The practice has been for the minority of the committee by debate and by amendment to manifest its dissent touching any provisions of the bill, and it is for that purpose I have claimed for a short time the right of general debate.

This bill omits, Mr. Chairman, to appropriate for salaries of ministers and chargés d'affaires for 1885 $30,858, money that has been due for over twelve months to those officers. It also omits to appropriate for Mr. Hall, late minister to the Central American States, and to Mr. Osborn in round numbers $6,000, deficiencies for their salaries not provided for and which have been due to them for a year. It also omits to provide for contingent expenses for the consular service for the year 1885, in round numbers $35,000, and fails to provide for the contingent expenses of the same service for the year 1886, in round numbers $18,000; making in the aggregate over $90,000.

There are other minor items that the committee ought to have recommended in my judgment that would make the omission in the bill substantially $100,000 for our diplomatic and consular service. Now, I want to ask the gentlemen constituting the majority of the committee, who control the bill in committee and control it largely here, to explain to this Committee of the Whole why these items have been omitted. I want to know before I proceed to discuss item by item these omitted provisions whether or no your Secretary of State and your President have been so remiss and unfaithful in the discharge of their duties as well as your ministers and your consuls that they are not worthy to receive that money which the law gives them and which uniform custom and practice gives them; because if it be true that this Department has been so loose in its methods that it does not deserve to have the money that is due its employés under the law then I want to know it, so that some proceeding of censure, investigation, or otherwise can be instituted by the Congress of the United States which will develop the shortcomings of this service and hold up to the censure of public opinion the maladministration of that Department and the administration.

The first item that I desire to call attention to is to be found on the fourth page of the estimates:

To pay the balance found due upon the account of Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co., United States bankers at London, for drafts of ministers' salaries paid by them, being deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $22,000.

Then there is another item at another place due to the same parties, and still another item to the same parties for the payment of salaries of secretaries of legation, $2,847. It may perhaps be a matter of inquiry by some gentlemen how it is, as the salaries of these employés are appropriated for year by year, that there can possibly be a deficiency. In answer to that I will say that the practice of the State Department is to lump the appropriations for these salaries, the appropriations for the salaries of ministers and for the secretaries of legations, and then to draw upon that fund. It is a mere matter of book-keeping.

Frequently, however, when many changes are made, as for instance during the year 1885, after President Cleveland was inaugurated, it happens two men draw salaries for the same position. That happens in this way: Pending the appointment of a new minister at, for instance, the court of St. James, the old minister remains until the new one appears and is presented. In the mean time the new minister has his instruction and his transit pay, which comes out of this general fund, while at the same time the old minister receives his regular pay, and the result is that for a time we are paying two salaries for a minister at the court of St. James. I have a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury touching this practice in the State Department, as follows:

For fourth quarter, 1884	4,375 00
For first quarter, 1885	4,375 00
For part second quarter, 1885	259 38
Mr. McLane received during the same fiscal year	4,618 05
	18,002 43
So in Germany—Mr. Kasson, the late, and Mr. Pendleton, the present minister, drew out of the appropriation for 1885	$22,256 01
Though in Russia, during the same period, the amount paid was only	$17,224 04

These cases fully illustrate, I hope, the cause of the exhaustion of the appropriation.

If every post were filled July 1 of any year and no changes occurred until after June 30 of the next, the appropriation would not become exhausted.

The American bankers, Brown, Shipley & Co., our financial agents or bankers at London, have paid the drafts for these salaries, and have been laying out their money for a year because the deficiency has not been made up. Now, it may or may not have been improper for Secretary Bayard and President Cleveland to make these payments in the way they have done. Suffice it to say they did it, and these gentlemen, our correspondents, have paid the money and we owe it to them; we have owed it to them for over a year, and they ought to be paid. So it is with regard to some of these other items. Then again, as this appropriation was exhausted, one of our representatives in Central America, Mr. Henry C. Hall, who was not paid by drafts upon Brown, Shipley & Co., was left unpaid to the amount of $1,500, and we have owed him that sum for more than twelve months, and have kept him out of his money without interest. And this item includes, I believe, some money paid by him to other people.

How much longer is this servant of the Government to go without his money? The same is the case with Mr. Osborn, to a considerably larger amount, somewhere near $2,000. I believe I have said enough about these items to show the propriety of paying them, and I now desire to speak briefly of the consular service. There are two sections of the Revised Statutes that I desire to bring to the attention of the committee. The first is section 1748, and I hope gentlemen will notice its language:

The President is authorized to provide at the public expense all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags and signs, as he shall think necessary for the several legations, consulates, and commercial agencies, in the transaction of their business.

Observe the language: "The President is authorized to provide" these things at the public expense. Turn now to section 1706.

The President may allow consuls-general and consuls and commercial agents who are not allowed to trade actual expenses of office rent, not to exceed in any case 20 per centum of the amount of annual compensation allowed to such officer, whenever he shall think there is sufficient reason therefor.

Under these two sections of the statute the duty of the Secretary of State, or of the President, is to make these allowances. For a number of years the expenditures and appropriations to meet the expenses under these two sections have been as follows. I give them in round numbers: In 1878, $132,000; in 1879, $136,000; in 1880, 144,000; in 1882, $151,000; in 1883, $154,000. In 1884 the expenditures were $151,000, although the appropriation was only $110,000; in 1885 the expenditures were $144,000, although the appropriation was only $110,000; and in 1886 the appropriation was $110,000, and the expenditures were only a little less than $150,000. The deficiency estimate coming up to us for 1886, the fiscal year just closed, is $40,000. The Committee on Appropriations have recommended of this deficiency for the year 1886 $22,000 instead of $40,000.

Now, it may be claimed—I do not know what the gentleman from Missouri is going to claim—that any excess of expenditure over and above the appropriation here contained is not in pursuance of law. I can not agree with that view, because under these sections of the Revised Statutes which I have read the allowance of rent is to be made without reference to appropriations, and the other contingent expenses the President is to allow——

Mr. LONG. At his discretion.

Mr. CANNON. At his discretion.

Mr. HITT. A discretion regulated largely by custom and the necessities of the service as organized according to law.

Mr. CANNON. I take it that so long as these two sections of the Revised Statutes remain, whenever the necessities of the consular and diplomatic service demand more than the bare $110,000, which seems to be all that the gentleman from Missouri is willing to recommend, the Department in the exercise of a sound discretion might exceed it. At any rate the Department has exceeded it both for the year 1885 and the year 1886, and has done so, I take it, under the statute, or, if you choose, without any authority whatever.

But I will let the gentleman from Missouri, if he continues to oppose these items, fight that matter out with his own Secretary of State and his own President. I will say, Mr. Chairman, I have wished several times since the consideration of this deficiency bill commenced that I could wash my hands of it and let the other side of the House, under the lead of the gentleman from Missouri, settle these matters with their own administration and their own Departments. Suggestions have been made to me from time to time that I should pursue this course; and I would have done so were it not that in regard to the service of our country, upon every sea and in every civilized and some uncivilized countries, the people there do not know the difference we have here between Democrats and Republicans; and I have felt that in the consideration of many items upon this bill I had a higher duty than a merely partisan one to perform; for although there is an administration in power with which I am not in harmony, yet after all and in spite of me it is my administration, it is my service, it is my Government. Hence I stand here advocating these appropriations for this service. I stand here saying the honor of my country requires that our own citizens and the citizens of other countries should be paid what we owe them.

Now, the deficiency for the year 1885, a year ago, it will be remembered, was $34,970.35 for rent and contingent expenses of consulates. We have a statement in this document submitted by the State Department as to what the deficiency will be for 1886; and the very important statement is made that in the first six months of 1886 the contingent expenses of consulates of the United States were $80,000, leaving only $30,000 for the last six months.

Now, what is the result of these deficiencies? The year 1885 has passed. You and I can not turn the hand back upon the dial and live it over again, nor can these Departments. What has been the result? The result has been that, as the necessary money was not appropriated, when these consuls have drawn their drafts on the depositary selected by the United States for contingent expenses or salaries due them and negotiated by them, the consul gets his money. The draft starts on its tedious journey for payment. By the time it arrives, which may be one month, two months, three months, four months, the scanty appropriation of $110,000 is exhausted, and the draft upon which the consul has received the money is protested, dishonored, and sent on its weary journey back. What is the result? Our representatives who go abroad to uphold the national standard and the national honor, to extend trade and make our Government respectable, are met by the correspondent, who has relations with the commercial public about him, with the statement, "Here is your draft, drawn upon your Government by an officer of the Government; it has been protested and dishonored; pay me the money." The compensation of most of these consuls is so small that they have not the money; and the result is, that in every land almost that the sun shines upon are to be found these correspondents who hold to-day the dishonored drafts drawn by our consuls. Is not that a nice way for us to extend our trade and our credit to gain favor in foreign ports?

Yet, Mr. Chairman—and I am glad the gentleman from Missouri gives me his attention—this is the legitimate result and outcome of the appropriations fought for through thick and thin, and, under the "iron rule" that the gentleman from Pennsylvania talked about the other day, forced through for the last three years appropriations of $110,000 when there ought to have been $150,000 appropriated for this item.

Why, sir, in the book which I have before me the Secretary of State, in speaking of the year 1886—I drop for a moment the year 1885—gives on page 18 of the supplemental deficiency estimates a long list of protested drafts, twenty-six in all, drawn July 1, 1885, and July 9, 1885, &c. He says:

> It will be noticed that all of the above drafts are now about nine months overdue, and considerable time must yet elapse before their payment. The law makes no provision for the payment of interest on these delayed payments, nor for the expense of protest fees.
> Moreover, besides the mortification caused consuls by the return of their drafts dishonored, there is imposed upon them, in consequence, unusual difficulty in negotiating drafts in future. It often happens that there is only one banker or merchant in the consul's locality who will negotiate bills on the United States, and he is not disposed to negotiate after such bills are returned dishonored.
> An additional appropriation of about $40,000 now, in anticipation of the deficiency for the current fiscal year, would relieve the service of its impending embarrassment.

These estimates were submitted nearly six months ago. Still no appropriation has been made, and the drafts remain unpaid and dishonored.

Well, gentlemen, it is true this is a Democratic administration, but as an American citizen I feel humiliated that any man should go to any part of this world as my representative to meet treatment of this kind. Are we poor? Is not the money in the Treasury to pay these demands? Would the Government of this country have suffered if some portion of the teeming millions of surplus had been voted out of the Treasury, as it ought to have been fifteen months ago, to pay these drafts? I surmise not. I thought of this and many similar transactions when the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, spoke the other day of the "iron rule" under which they propose to hold appropriations down.

So, gentlemen, in my service of seven years on the Committee on Appropriations I have always stood, when I was in majority, as I was in one Congress, and in the minority, as I have been most of the time, ever ready to economize and retrench where it could be legitimately done. But the blunder of economizing when it can not be legitimately done, when it leads us to refuse to pay what we owe, is not politic, is not honest.

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman knows I agree with him as to the necessity of this appropriation. I would, however, like him to explain how these deficiencies could have existed since 1878. I say they existed in 1882 and 1883. At that time I believe the committee was under control of his Republican friends.

Mr. RICE. They followed bad examples. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELMONT. If the gentleman will permit me, we have in the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and carried through the House this year $150,000 for the first time in ten years in order to avoid this discreditable deficiency which seems to have been repeated since 1878. This must be the first time the gentleman from Illinois stated it so clearly and effectively to the House.

Mr. CANNON. My friend will recollect that in the Forty-fourth Congress the Democratic party came into power in this House. I have before me the original appropriation made year by year for this service by the Democratic party. I have not those prior to 1878, although if necessary I can find them with a little effort. In 1878 $115,000 was appropriated, with a deficiency of $17,000; 1879, $115,000; 1880, $115,000.

Mr. LONG. How much deficiency?

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-one thousand dollars and $29,000. In 1881 the appropriation was $125,000; $13,000 deficiency.

Now, mark you, commence two years when the Republican party had a majority, a bare majority, of the House, when you had held it by an overwhelming majority commencing with 1874. What did the Republican party do? It appropriated $135,000 as against $110,000 when you had power. Again, $135,000 for 1883. What did the Democracy do?

Mr. BELMONT. The fact is the same. If you created similar deficiency, even if smaller in amount, still you brought about the same condition of affairs as to require protested drafts.

Mr. CANNON. We did not appropriate enough in two short years. We did the best we could. The Government had been demoralized during the previous years. We did jump up to $135,000. The moment you came into power under the lead of the gentleman from Missouri you put it down to $110,000, and there it has staid until the present year.

Mr. BURNES. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

Mr. BELMONT. I do not think I shall occupy even that amount of time. These questions can be better settled as we proceed with the reading of the bill. I have amendments to offer covering the different points made by the gentleman from Illinois. I hope therefore we will not spend any more time in general discussion. I do not think my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] intended injuriously to affect the State Department. But it does seem to me that these omissions from this bill of provisions of obvious necessity for the proper administration of an important branch of the public service prove the efficacy of the new rules distributing the appropriation bills among several committees of the House. The Committee on Foreign Affairs did report a bill, which was carried through the House, containing an appropriation sufficient to avoid this difficulty. The gentleman from Missouri representing the Committee on Appropriations does not seem inclined to resist these proper amendments except as they may be subject to the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. When has the gentleman from Missouri been converted?

Mr. BELMONT. I presume when he understood the facts.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, he understood the facts long before this bill was reported.

Mr. BELMONT. However that may be, I hope we will proceed with the bill. I do not know that anything need be said on this side.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the Committee on Appropriations are of opinion that they had some good reason for not appropriating for the items mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois. I only wish to submit now to that gentleman one consideration, of which I think he has full knowledge. I believe it has not been the policy of that committee, and I am quite sure it has not been my policy, to consider in the allowance or disallowance of any estimate whether the administration which would have authority to expend it was Democratic or Republican. Whatever may be the feeling of the gentleman from Illinois upon that question, and whatever may be the force and effect of his unmitigated partisanship, I believe that he is conscious of the fact that so far as the majority of this committee is concerned, and so far especially as I am concerned, we are disposed to be more strict with our friends than with our political opponents.

In the Forty-eighth Congress it was believed by the committee and by the House that $110,000 would be sufficient to defray the ordinary expenses of the consular service. That sum was appropriated and a deficiency ensued. At the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress a like sum was appropriated and expended and a deficiency ensued. The simple question, therefore, brought before the committee was not whether Mr. Cleveland, our President of the United States and a Democrat—and by the way the best and most growing that this country has ever had since the days of Andrew Jackson—would do his duty, but the question is whether one of his officials, one of his clerks, as Mr. Benton used to name them felicitously, should confine himself to the appropriations as made by Congress, or whether he should be permitted to expend exactly that which he believed was required by the necessities and dignities of the service.

In saying this, sir, I beg to add that I realize the full worth of the Secretary who is now at the head of the State Department. I believe that this House and this Congress recognizes him as a gentleman whose integrity is above reproach and beyond all suspicion; and I will say furthermore that if I had any doubt upon either proposition, the fact that my friend upon my right [Mr. LORE] represents the State from which the Secretary hails would be sufficient to satisfy me that nothing vicious could come out of little Delaware.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Appropriations Committee have simply discharged their duty as they saw it. That committee had doubts as to the regularity and legality of these expenditures.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is as much exercised over the protested drafts that have been returned to the Government as a celebrated gentleman once was over the question of warming-pans.

Why, sir, what are these drafts? When I draw a draft, unless I have some improper and unlawful purpose in view, I will ascertain in advance if there is money to my credit, and unless I have such assurance I can not safely draw such draft. In fact I must ascertain that fact before I draw the draft. A man who draws a draft should have and must have a balance to meet that draft. The fault is not the fault of the Secretary of State; it is the fault of the accursed system under which that Department has been operated for twenty-five years or more. The whole system is wrong. We appropriate for the salary of a consul, say in China, $3,500. That $3,500 ought to be a sacred trust placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment of that salary and exclusively for that purpose. That money ought to be set apart for him and used for no other purpose; and when it is otherwise used it seems to me it is unlawfully used. There never ought to be a deficiency in the consuls' salaries. There never should be a deficiency in the salaries for ministers, because the law has fixed their salaries and Congress has appropriated for them, and the amount has been placed at the disposal of the minister and the consul, to be paid to them through the proper channels.

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman yield to me now for a moment?

Mr. BURNES. Certainly.

Mr. BELMONT. I was going to say to the gentleman a moment since that this was not a question of deficiencies in respect to salaries at all. These are deficiencies for expenditures under the law, for rent, stationery, postage, furniture, traveling expenses; and the gentleman will see that it is impossible for the Secretary of State to undertake to inform consuls all over the world as to the exact condition of the contingent fund. It may be, for instance, that a question like the fisheries, arising in Canada, will come up where a consul is called suddenly to perform an additional amount of duty. He is expected to perform the duty. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse to allow him to send a telegram because there happens to be no fund specially set apart for that purpose?

The salaries of consuls are divided into classes; and those whose salaries exceed $1,000 are also entitled to a sum for rent equivalent to 20 per cent. of their salaries. The consular salaries for the present fiscal year, above those of $1,000 per annum, amount to $345,000. Twenty per cent. of this sum alone would be $69,000, just $1,000 less than the amount to be expended for rent this year. This rent charge is provided for under section 1706 of the Revised Statutes. Then under 1732 rent is to be allowed feed consuls, and this additional rent charge would much more than make up the difference of $1,000. The amounts of the other main items of consular expenses are almost as certainly fixed as that of rent. For the first six months of the present year the expenses for postage have been $12,000; for stationery and blank forms, $11,934; for furniture, $1,669; for traveling expenses, messenger service, and miscellaneous expenditures, $12,000.

Now, the fund is provided by the last appropriation bill—but I beg pardon of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] for occupying his time——

Mr. BURNES. Go on.

Mr. BELMONT. I should not have done so except that I think he was under a misapprehension as to this part of the appropriation. The fact is the rent charge alone under the law amounted to about $70,000, and the total appropriation was only $110,000, so that all the other items which were necessary in the proper discharge of the duties of consuls in different parts of the world remain unprovided for. I can not imagine any statute which could be so drawn as to provide them in each case. The only thing the House can do is to meet the repeated request of the Department, which by annual experience finds that about $150,000 is necessary; and this year we have fortunately appropriated that amount for the year 1887. It seems to me if the gentleman from Missouri gives his attention to this matter he will not find objection to the amendment when it is proposed.

Mr. BURNES. I was pursuing a principle which was illustrated in the case of a consul in China. The same principle prevails, in my judgment, whether it is with reference to the payment of the salary of a consul or whether it has reference to an appropriation made for contingent expenses.

I have said that these things result from a mistaken system, and the system ought to be corrected. Or the question ought to come directly before this House, which I regret to say is too frequently on its knees before Department clerks and before other branches of the Government. I say, sir, I would like exceedingly if this system could be changed. There are a certain number of gentlemen engaged in the foreign service—we will say there are three hundred and fifty consuls and consuls-general. Now we appropriate not only to pay each one a certain salary, but we appropriate $110,000 to pay the expenses of the service. If that is not sufficient, why do we appropriate at all? If deficiencies can be created at will, if at least this Department of the Government can be operated in disregard of appropriations, why appropriate at all? Why not give carte blanche to run that Department of the Government without appropriation? I am simply saying that of this $110,000 the Secretary of State may well place to the credit of each consul, three hundred and fifty in number, first, the amount allowed for rent; secondly, a sum which experience teaches him to be sufficient for stationery, and so forth through the list. That sum can be divided out to each one of these consuls and consuls-general as well for the salary of each as for the contingent expenses of each. Why can not this be done here? For the simple reason that this unbridled Department of the Government feels it is not in accordance with the dignity of the Republic to live on $110,000 a year for the consular service, and therefore, regardless of the appropriation, $150,000 are spent.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman—for he is speaking of a project which is new and the explanation of which will be very instructive to those carrying on the Government—will he explain a little more fully how he would have the fund distributed to each of the six hundred consuls and consular officers as to all the minute classes of expenditures?

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman will show me there are six hundred consuls and consuls-general I shall be very glad to receive the information.

Mr. HITT. Consuls and consular agents. There are that many consular posts.

Mr. BURNES. We do not pay posts; we pay consuls.

Mr. HITT. The plan of the gentleman seems so far-reaching, it should be applied all through. It would be very instructive to have it explained by the gentleman as a leading Democrat, so that we may know what is to be the policy of those who are to carry on the Government in this minutely classified way.

Mr. BURNES. So far as I am concerned, weak as I am and inexperienced as I am in regard to the affairs of Government, I would have every Department of the Government, whether the administration be Republican or Democratic, live within the means provided for its support by the Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I have said that having particular confidence in the bona fides of this expenditure, being quite sure that the excellent gentleman who presides at the other end of the Avenue and that the gentleman at the head of the Department of State are honest and faithful in the discharge of public duties, although each is liable to make mistakes, as we all are—having this confidence, I propose and the Committee on Appropriations propose to submit to the gentleman occupying that chair, a gentleman distinguished for his learning and legal ability, to submit to him as a question of law under the rules of the House, whether these expenditures are sanctioned by law or not. If they are not sanctioned by law, why should we pay them; and if they are sanctioned by law, we will as a matter of course admit the amendments of my friend from New York [Mr. BELMONT] when he offers them. If these expenditures are contrary to law, then these gentlemen must come before the House and ask for compensation as thousands and tens of thousands of other good men have done who have had claims against the Government, and in that case they have simply mistaken the tribunal in which their claims should be considered. We are compelled under the rules of this House, which we, the Appropriations Committee, have sought at every step and stage to honor and respect, to make no appropriation for any object that was not authorized by law. I remember the other day the eminent and illustrious gentlemen from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL], and others, declared in Committee of the Whole, with the applause of Democrats and Republicans both, that hereafter they would emphasize their opposition to provisions of appropriations unauthorized by law by voting against every appropriation bill that made such appropriations.

We have followed our conceptions of our duty under the rule; we have lived up to them. If these claims are meritorious and are within the rule, put them in this bill, and let us then understand that if a claim is meritorious the rules will not shut it out. I have said this much, sir, simply because my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] (who knows how to aggravate us sometimes, though always in a pleasant way) has dared to impute to us a disposition to act in one way when we have a Democratic President and in another way when we have a Republican President. If the application of his remark was not to me, it was to the committee, and equally undeserved. Reserving the balance of my time, I ask for a decision.

The Clerk read as follows:

French and American claims: For payment of the amount necessary to strike a balance with France, after the payment, under the final award made by the late French and American Claims Commission against the United States, of the claims of French citizens against this Government, under the treaty of January 15, 1880, between this country and France, $15,639.16.

Mr. CANNON. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Foreign intercourse:

Salaries of ministers, to pay balance found due upon the account of Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co., United States bankers at London, for drafts of ministers' salaries paid by them, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $22,408.02; to pay the balance found due to Henry C. Hall, minister of the United States to the Central American states, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $1,500; to enable the accounting officers to effect a proper settlement of the accounts of certain officers of the United States acting chargés d'affaires ad interim, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $6,950.96; to enable the accounting officers to pay the balance due upon the account of Thomas Q. Osborn, minister resident and consul-general to the Argentine Republic, for a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $3,903.12; to pay the balance found due upon the account of Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co., United States bankers at London, for drafts of salaries of secretaries of legation paid them, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, July 7, 1886, $2,847.07.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I have the duty to discharge of making a point of order against the amendment as proposed. I do not know, sir, that it need be argued. I do not feel inclined to argue it. The whole subject is before you.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the ground of objection to the amendment?

Mr. BURNES. The ground of objection is that these are expenditures in excess of appropriations and in violation of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean that they violate any other law than the law limiting the right of expenditure to the amount that is appropriated?

Mr. BURNES. This is the law:

No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation.

Nothing can be plainer. There is the naked law. I leave the question to the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, we have had from year to year, for several years past, the expenditures of the Government going on without reference to the appropriations made by the Congress, which, by the Constitution, is charged with the duty of making the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government. In addition to the fact that the Constitution charges Congress with this duty, and that the Congress has performed the duty as it understands it (and Congress is the judge of its own powers and duties in this respect), a law has been passed, the law just read by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], which forbids the expenditure of money by any Department of the Government in excess of the amount appropriated. Yet, sir, we go on from year to year with the Departments of the Government utterly disregarding that law, utterly disregarding the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and assuming the power to administer this Government in their own way, and to expend any amount of money they choose. This abuse is not confined to the State Department. It extends to every Department of the Government, and has become so habitual that it seems to be regarded as lawful that this should be done, and as impertinent for members of Congress to inquire why it is done. Now we ought to arrest this evil, and I know of no way to arrest it but by refusing to make appropriations for these Departments when they make these excessive expenditures. I felt specially gratified, therefore, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], who has just taken his seat, announced his purpose of treating these extraordinary expenditures as mere claims against the Government, to be determined like any other claims that have been created without authority of law. If Congress will take this course it can control the Departments of this Government. If, in view of the practice which has become habitual and reckless in the expenditure of the people's money not appropriated, we refuse to make this appropriation, we may hope for some regularity and propriety in administration.

I speak without reference to partisanship, without reference to the question whether we may have Democratic or Republican administration. The Congress of the United States is charged by the Constitution with determining how much public money shall be expended and for what purposes. That duty is not confided to the Departments. The law provides that they shall expend the money which may be appropriated by Congress for their use, and shall not expend any more. In the face of this law, in the face of the theory of our Government, in the face of the Constitution, they go on creating deficiences of millions every year. There ought to be an end of this. I trust that the Committee on Appropriations, and all the committees charged with the duty of reporting appropriations, will insist that the Departments of the Government shall in this respect be subordinated to the power and duty of Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman will allow me to ask him a question. Suppose a statute authorizes the appointment of an officer whose term is to continue four years and until his successor shall relieve him at the post of duty, wherever that may be. Suppose the appropriation is insufficient to pay the two officers, where there are really two officers under commission at the same time, and two salaries must necessarily be paid, does not the gentleman hold that to be a proper deficiency? That is precisely the case here.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, scarcely any proposition can be framed in regard to which there may not be suggested something of an extraordinary character which should not come within the general rule. When I speak of deficiencies by millions, I do not speak of such a case as that mentioned by the gentleman, and he understands that very well. I speak of the habitual practice of officers administering the Government in disregarding the appropriations by Congress and expending any amount of money which their judgment of a proper policy may dictate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But I state the case actually presented. I thought my friend referred to it, because it is the precise case in point.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations and do not know anything about the special facts involved in this amendment. I only rose to unite my voice with that of the gentleman from Missouri in protesting against the continued violation of the law of Congress and the continued disregard of the Constitution by the Departments of the Government.

Mr. BELMONT addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question without further argument.

Mr. BELMONT. It seems to me that the law bearing on this matter might very properly be cited. I should regret very much if the remarks of my friend from Missouri or the gentleman from Texas should create the impression that I am in any way not in harmony with the purpose of this side of the House to insist that the Departments shall expend money as it is appropriated. But that is not the question in regard to this item, and for that reason I desired to say a word against the point of order. If the Chair does not wish to hear further argument, I will ask that the Clerk read the statute which compelled this expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the provision of law which the gentleman from New York desires to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 1740. No ambassador, envoy extraordinary, minister plenipotentiary, minister resident, commissioner, chargé d'affaires, secretary of legation, assistant secretary of legation, interpreter to any legation or consulate, or consul-general, consul, or commercial agent, mentioned in Schedules B and C, shall be entitled to compensation for his services, except from the time when he reaches his post and enters upon his official duties to the time when he ceases to hold such office, and for such time as is actually and necessarily occupied in receiving his instructions, not to exceed thirty days, and in making the direct transit between the place of his residence, when appointed, and his post of duty, at the commencement and termination of the period of his official service, for which he shall in all cases be allowed and paid, except as hereinafter mentioned. And no person shall be deemed to hold any such office after his successor is appointed and actually enters upon the duties of his office at his post of duty, nor after his official residence at such post has terminated if not so relieved. But no such allowance or payment shall be made to any consul-general, consul, or commercial agent, not embraced in schedules B and C, or to any vice-consul, vice-commercial agent, deputy consul, or consular agent, for the time so occupied in receiving instructions, or in such transit as aforesaid; nor shall any such officer as is referred to in this section be allowed compensation for the time so occupied in such transit, at the termination of the period of his official service, if he has resigned or been recalled therefrom for any malfeasance in his office.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether the Committee of the Whole or the House should appropriate money to meet expenditure beyond former appropriations is a matter for the committee to determine; it does not touch the point of order. This is a bill to appropriate money to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1886, and for other purposes therein stated. The very object of the bill is to appropriate money to meet expenditures beyond former appropriations. The point of order is overruled. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question being taken on the amendment, it was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries interpreters to legations: To enable the accounting officers to allow and credit John A. Halderman, late minister and consul-general of the United States to Siam, the sum of $124.68, paid by him for salary of interpreter from July 1, 1884, to December 31, 1884, before he had received information of the reduction of the appropriation for salary of interpreter to the legation at Bangkok, Siam, from $1,000 to $500, by the act of July 7, 1884.

Mr. CANNON. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay George C. Foulk, chargé d'affaires ad interim at Seoul, Corea, the amount of protest fees and expenses incurred by him on drafts returned on account of the exhaustion of the appropriation for salaries of ministers for the fiscal year 1885, against which they were drawn, $24.01.

Mr. BURNES. I reserve a point of order on the amendment. I merely desire to call attention to the fact that there is no room for supposing that the salary in this case payable by law was not appropriated, and evidently it was drawn or ought to have been drawn. Furthermore, it seems to me that $24.01 is a pretty good fee for protesting one draft. But I submit this is on a par with a good many other propositions which we see presented here.

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman's remarks, which I understand to be upon the merits of the amendment——

Mr. BURNES. I have reserved a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I am rising to speak upon the merits of the amendment. As I explained in the general debate, the salaries of chargés d'affaires are put in hotch-pot, and are drawn against in the same way as the salaries of ministers. This man was a chargé at Corea. He drew his draft for his salary. When that draft was presented there was no money to pay it, no doubt on account of the fund having been exhausted for the payment of other officers, and it was returned to him unpaid.

Mr. RICE. Drawing drafts is the usual way in which these officers get their salaries.

Mr. CANNON. Now I am not quite clear that I can exactly locate the place where this chargé performed his duty; but I have an impression that Corea is a long way off. I do not know what the protest fees may have been; but I do know that this draft came from this representative of the Government on the other side of the world for salary which was due; and it was not paid, because the money had been exhausted in paying salaries of other chargés, so that the draft was protested and returned. Now it may be that somewhere in this administration there is somebody who would undertake to steal the small difference between $24.01 and the amount which my friend from Missouri supposes the protest fees, expenses of exchange, and re-exchange, &c., ought properly to be. But this item comes here regularly submitted as a deficiency; and I think this Committee of the Whole ought to vote it on this bill.

Mr. HITT. It is not on one draft, but a number of drafts.

Mr. CANNON. My colleague [Mr. HITT] is better up in all these matters of the diplomatic service than I am or than the gentleman from Missouri is, and he says it is on a number of drafts.

Mr. BURNES. It is one draft, and so stated in the amendment offered by himself as well as in the estimate.

Mr. HITT. It is stated as drafts; it is in the plural.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear what the gentleman from Missouri has to say.

Mr. BURNES. I have to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law authorizing this man to draw this draft on this Government or for payment to him for the expense of the protest of this draft. Whatever may be the regulation of the State Department, whatever may be his presumed authority, there is no law authorizing him to have refunded to him the expense of protest of a draft drawn by him on the Government.

Mr. BURROWS. How much is this?

Mr. CANNON. Twenty-four dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Missouri how these consular officers are paid? How are their salaries sent to them?

Mr. BURNES. The Department sends drafts to the party entitled to payment. It may be possibly on London. The draft ought to be the draft of the Government. This gentleman in Corea, a country recently discovered, it appears drew his draft upon the Government here. What law authorized him to do so? That draft was protested. What law is there requiring us to pay the expense of that protest?

Mr. BELMONT. This is not a question arising in consular service necessarily, but it is the case as well of a diplomatic officer who takes the place of a minister when a vacancy occurs. Under the organizing act of 1856 a man in such a position is called chargé d'affaires ad interim, being in charge of the legation, and is entitled to receive one-half the minister's salary, although his own salary as secretary of legation is not then continued. For instance, our minister to Mexico has lately returned to this country, and during his absence his secretary of legation is in charge of his office, and he is, under the law of 1856, entitled to 50 per cent. of the minister's salary. So it is in Vienna, where we have no minister at present. The long-continued vacancy at that post materially increases the sum necessary to be expended under this head. As now interpreted the law requires a separate appropriation. The House can not with propriety fail to meet this obligation.

The CHAIRMAN. The trouble of the Chair grows out of its ignorance of the law. If a minister has the right to draw his salary and it is not paid, he would be entitled to have refunded the expense of protest. But if he has no right to draw for his salary upon the Government, then the Government is not liable for the expense of the protest, and it should not be.

Mr. CANNON. I understand from my colleague [Mr. HITT], who has had long experience in the diplomatic service, as well as from an investigation I have made into the subject myself, that some of our diplomatic corps are paid at our bankers in London, but our diplomatic officers in Asia and other places throughout the world are paid by drafts drawn upon the Government on other bankers than those in London.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Missouri says there is no authority in law for the drawing of any such drafts.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Missouri understands such to have been the unbroken practice.

Mr. BURNES. It has been the practice; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. CANNON. In the absence of authority to send disbursing officers about the world as the Army paymaster pays the Army, of course the payments will be made according to the commercial usages of the world, which, as we know, are well established.

Mr. HITT. The officer at the close of the quarter draws his draft against the place where the money of the Government is nearest at hand. His commission is his authority from day to day, and it gives him credit in the eyes of the bank. When there is no money in the distant bank the draft goes back to the local bank and there awaits payment. As the gentleman says, it is dishonored.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest there is no law authorizing any officer of the Government, except officers connected with the Army and the Navy as paymaster, to draw on the Government. That is manifest. A foreign minister or consul has no right to draw a draft on the Government. It never occurred to any person that he may draw upon the Treasury at will for these amounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to submit a question to the gentleman from Indiana. Suppose there be no law authorizing the draft to be drawn, and yet it was drawn and the Government paid the protest fees?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that they were paid by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair means paid by some officer of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this official undertook to draw a certain sum of money on a draft when no such money was to his credit. Now, the authority for drawing such drafts seems to be only a custom allowed, for convenience perhaps in certain cases. But certainly there is no warrant of law for it.

Mr. HITT. Let me interrupt the gentleman to state that the custom of the service is for the officer when he goes out to carry with him a paper from the State Department addressed to the Government's financial agent or banker abroad, setting forth his character, office, and salary, which is something in the nature of a letter of credit, such as my friend from Indiana would take from his banker in New York when traveling in Europe, and that paper, accompanied as it is by his commission from the President, constitutes his financial credentials at the post in Europe or Asia or elsewhere to which he is accredited. Then as the quarter's salary falls due, these documents having been made known to the financial institutions through which he draws his money, he presents his draft for the proportionate amount or quarter of his salary as ascertained by the law and by this letter of credit or document which is signed by the Secretary of State, and draws his money, usually through a local bank at the place where he is stationed, upon the bankers of our Government at London. The Government takes care of the loss by exchange. That is the custom.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the statement of the gentleman throws any light upon this question. I concede that if the money is paid by the United States and comes through this channel by reason of this paper which is furnished through the State Department the inference would be fairly drawn that the drafts in some sense are properly drawn, or that there was some authority for them. I do not understand that this balance, if allowed, would be in favor of the Department, but is a balance certified in favor of the person by whom the draft in this case was drawn. But these transactions, if the statement of the gentleman from Illinois be correct that the consul or minister goes abroad with a letter of credit and is permitted to draw a draft upon the funds of the Government to pay his own salary at London, for instance, where our funds are mainly deposited for the payment of our foreign service, why then it is manifest that the Government would be placed at the mercy of every person who had such letters and thought proper to draw upon the fund for any amount when he knew he had no right to do so. I admit if the money had been paid by the State Department out of any fund it would seem proper that this loss for protest ought to be paid. But the fact that the draft went to protest would seem to establish the fact that the party who drew it was not authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman concede that these consuls are allowed to draw drafts on the Government funds for their salaries?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Government would have paid it if he had the right to draw it and the amount was due him.

The CHAIRMAN. But does the gentleman from Indiana concede that such drafts are allowed by the Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not concede it, because until the gentleman made the suggestion that he did make, which is the first I have heard of such a system, I had every reason to believe that another plan was pursued.

Now, as I said a little while ago, the main depository for the payment of our foreign service is in London.

Mr. HITT. But not for the Asiatic service.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the main for all the branches of the foreign service the funds are deposited in London. Now the Government draws on that fund in favor of the various persons in foreign employ who are entitled to receive it under the appropriations made for their employment. No other plan could be safely pursued. There may be instances where under peculiar circumstances the Government might honor a draft drawn upon a fund in London or elsewhere; but the right of any person in our foreign service to go and draw drafts ad libitum upon such a fund would not be tolerated for a moment, I imagine, by the head of any Department of the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If this consul drew a draft where he had no authority to draw it, and the Treasury Department declined to pay it, if it be a case of that kind, the man who draws the draft must himself bear the cost of protest.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in a good deal of doubt about the matter; but thinks if the Department owed this salary, and it was usual to get it in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and the draft was drawn for more than was placed to the credit of the Government, on being protested, that the man who drew the draft ought not to be put to the expense of paying these charges; and the Chair holds the amendment in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hardly think any gentleman is authorized to say that this draft was properly drawn. There has been no such statement to the House or to the Committee on Appropriations. On the contrary, the fair presumption on all of the facts, as far as I am aware, is that the draft was drawn without authority, and for that reason was protested.

Mr. HITT. This item is reported to the House by the Secretary of State himself and the payment recommended.

Mr. CANNON. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana I will state that this estimate comes from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitted by the Secretary of State, for these protest fees on the draft drawn, which was stated to be in payment of salary. Some little credit must, I take it, be given to the estimates that are formally and in due course of law submitted. I think it is a mean government that will not appropriate in advance for the payment of the salaries of its employés, to pay its consular officers and others; and a meaner government still not to pay the poor fellow the $24 on this protested paper.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to correct the gentleman from Illinois. I object to his stating that the draft was $24.

Mr. CANNON. I said that was the amount of the protest.

Mr. BURNES. The exact amount is $24.01. That 1 cent is the straw that breaks the camel's back.

Mr. CANNON. If there is any difficulty about that, I will pay the 1 cent myself.

The question being taken on Mr. CANNON's amendment, it was adopted.

Mr. MORROW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after line 40:

"To enable the accounting officers to pay to Charles L. Scudder for his services as clerk to the United States legation at Corea from March 29, 1883, to March 9, 1885, the sum of $3,500.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order on this proposition that there was no law authorizing the appointment of that officer, no law authorizing him to serve.

Mr. MORROW. It appears from a letter from the Secretary of State that the clerk's fees or salary at this particular point should have been paid out of the contingent fund of the Department of State, and that that fund was simply not sufficient to pay the amount of salary. On the point of order I desire to have read the letter of the Secretary of State in answer to an inquiry about this claim.

Mr. BURNES. Let me draw the line somewhere. Let me say that the contingent fund is appropriated for clerk-hire at certain places. This gentleman's name is not included, nor is this consulate included. Furthermore, as regards the general sum appropriated for clerk-hire, that is to be used at the discretion of the Secretary of State. There is no law for this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California concede there is no law authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. MORROW. I do not. The law provides a contingent fund, but so far as the clerk at Corea was concerned, as it was a new legation established by law, the contingent fund for that year was not sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from California to show the authority for this appropriation.

Mr. MORROW. It is contained in the letters which I have sent to the desk.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, February 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, accompanied by an affidavit made by Mr. Charles L. Scudder, of San Francisco, touching his connection with the legation of the United States at Corea, from March 29, 1883, to March 9, 1885. You accordingly ask for a statement from the Department showing the justice of Mr. Scudder's claim for $3,500 and the reasons for its payment.

It is true that Mr. Scudder's presence with Mr. Foote, who was, during the periods mentioned, United States minister to Corea, was known to the Department, but his employment was not contingent upon a promise of the Department that his services were to be rewarded, and so far as the records disclose the fact they do not show that Mr. Scudder has a lien upon this Government except so far as Congress may deem his unpaid services worthy of adequate compensation. To this extent the Department is disposed to favor Mr. Scudder's claim and to say that Congress should make such provision as it thinks equitable to meet the case upon a statement of the facts, which are these:

In his dispatch, No. 36, of October 24, 1883, Mr. Foote reported that his salary was inadequate to meet the demands upon him, and that the contingent allowance to his legation was also insufficient.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, in his reply of December 23, 1883, No. 35, stated that Mr. Foote's wishes had been anticipated by the Department, so far as it could, by making provision in the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, not only for an increase in the minister's salary, but for provision as well to enable him to place his mission, which had but recently been established, upon a more efficient basis. Mr. Frelinghuysen's instruction concluded as follows:

"A specific appropriation for a secretary of legation has not been asked. An effort will, however, be made within the appropriation to allow you clerk-hire."

Afterward Mr. Foote, in his dispatch, No. 116, of September 5, 1885, called attention to the fact that Mr. Scudder had up to that time continued to serve him in a clerical capacity without compensation, and suggested that if some future provision could be made for Mr. Scudder it would be a just recognition of his services. Mr. Foote in this connection cited the Department's No. 35, of October 27, 1883, and referred to its promised recommendation.

Mr. Frelinghuysen replied November 24, 1884, No. 18. He explained that Congress had failed to make provision in accordance with the Department's recommendation, and how the appropriations (not otherwise assigned by the act itself) had been apportioned among the several consulates solely in the interest of the public service and its most pressing needs. Mr. Frelinghuysen's dispatch concluded:

"It was then found impossible to grant you any amount for clerk-hire from which Mr. Scudder might have been compensated; but if this shall be possible within the next appropriation, I need not assure you that the Department will do what it can to compensate him in that way for the very valuable services he has gratuitously rendered to you and this Government."

That Mr. Scudder's services might very properly receive some recognition is apparent; but under the circumstances of the case it is for Congress, not this Department, to determine the amount he should be paid. This measure partakes of the nature of relief. It does not rest upon any stipulated amount or approved sum of the Secretary of State as being due, for which a deficiency might be asked, but merely upon the suggestion of that officer to place at Mr. Foote's disposal an amount to be expended for clerk-hire from which Mr. Scudder might have been compensated, and which suggestion it was never in Mr. Frelinghuysen's power to fulfill, as has been shown.

I herewith return Mr. Scudder's affidavit as requested,

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. WILLIAM W. MORROW,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Salaries consular officers: To enable the accounting officers to allow and credit E. J. Smithers, consul of the United States at Chin-Kiang, the sum of $1,011.48, for his salary from July 9 to October 20, 1884, while acting as United States consul at Tien-Tsin, under the direction of the Department of State, the same having been disallowed in his accounts.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 49, insert the following:

"To reimburse the following consular officers the protest fees and expenses incurred by them on drafts returned on account of the exhaustion of appropriation for contingent expenses of United States consulates for the fiscal year 1885, against which they were drawn, namely: Thomas T. Gamble, $13.16; J. C. A. Wingate, United States consul at Foo Chow, $2.07; E. P. Mussey, United States consul at Mahe Seychelles, $2.87; total, $18.10."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

To enable the accounting officers to pay to George P. Pomeroy, late agent and consul-general of the United States at Cairo, Egypt, the amount allowed under section 1740 of the Revised Statutes for his transit from his late post (at Cairo) to his residence in the United States, namely, from July 6, 1884, to August 9, 1884, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $175.54.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after line 75 the following:

"That the proper accounting officer of the Treasury in adjusting the account of Benjamin S. Parker, late consul at Sherbrooke, shall allow him a credit for $186.71, that sum being due him for the contingent expenses of his office for the fiscal year 1885, the same not having been paid because of a deficiency in the appropriation for that year."

Mr. BELMONT. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I was about to offer a substitute——

Mr. BURNES. And I understand the substitute of the gentleman from New York will cover what is moved by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If there be no question about it, I am not tenacious about this being put in on my amendment.

Mr. BURNES. You will find it in the substitute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I withdraw my amendment temporarily.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Contingent expenses United States consulates: To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for contingent expenses of United States consulates, $22,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. HITT. I desire to offer an amendment at line 78.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has been recognized. His amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 79, insert the following:

"To enable the accounting officers to effect a proper settlement of the accounts of certain consular officers, being deficiencies, as follows: For the fiscal year 1885, $34,970.75; for the fiscal year 1884, $2,174.87; in all, $37,145.22."

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit to be offered first an amendment which will probably go in prior to his, and which is an amendment to line 78? I desire to offer an amendment to raise the amount for contingent expenses from $22,000 to $40,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois, if he proposes to change the amount, that would be in order before the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] is passed upon. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York to withhold his amendment for a moment.

Mr. BELMONT. I shall do so and offer an amendment to line 79.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the amendment he heretofore offered?

Mr. BELMONT. For the present I do. It may come in after the one I now send to the Clerk's desk is disposed of.

On page 4, lines 78 and 79, strike out "$22,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. HITT. That is the amendment I desire to see made. A little explanation is necessary in addition to what has been said. The Secretary of State has reported that this money has been expended. The gentleman from Illinois has read from a communication from the State Department which shows very fully and in detail how it was expended, and that it was in pursuance of law. Congress appropriated only $110,000 for the contingent expenses of the consular service, though it was plain to be seen by experience, and it was well known to the Committee on Appropriations, that it would be utterly impossible for the State Department to carry on the service for that amount, and a deficiency was inevitable and was expected. It was intended then, as it is now, to throw it over to the next session. You see our next session will be after election.

The statutes prescribe the organization, the duties, the expenditures, the details of the service, consular and diplomatic. The law, for example, provides that the amount of rent authorized to be paid shall be equal to 20 per cent. of the amount of the salaries of the consuls, and the salaries are all fixed by law. This 20 per cent. on $345,000, the total of salaries, would be sixty-nine thousand out of the one hundred and ten thousand appropriated for contingent expenses. The law prescribes the payment for postage, stationery, blank forms, furniture, newspapers, statistics, messenger service, the payment of a series of items that were mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and again referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. The Secretary of State, I suppose, deemed that it was not a matter of discretion whether he should continue the operations of the Department, the different branches of the service as already organized. I may say he was compelled to carry on the service, to keep it going, just as the captain of a ship is compelled to keep his ship moving, with all that belongs to its complex organization. When you give him a list of officers and a prescribed number of men whom he must employ and a great machine which he must keep going, then if you furnish him money only to pay the men and do not also give him enough to buy coal for the voyage, of course he has to go in debt for coal or never bring his ship through.

That is the situation of the Secretary of State; and I suppose the committee when they submitted this insufficient appropriation last year knew perfectly well that he would have to go on and carry out the existing general laws, and then allowed him much less than was absolutely necessary to carry on the machine, as you gentlemen of Congress constructed that machine, as you catalogued these officers, as you determined their functions and the amount that should be paid to them and for rent in proportion to the salaries fixed by law. The Secretary, I believe, honestly went on and expended the money. He did it, as I have been informed upon inquiry at the Department into details, with vigilance, with economy, and with rigid scrutiny. The money has been paid out by the officers from their own pockets in many instances, in others by the bankers, who believed that this Government would keep faith and carry out its own laws.

These dishonored drafts now floating about the world are many of them fifteen months old. By an amendment to the appropriation bill of 1884 it was provided that thereafter the feed consuls should not convert the fees beyond a certain amount to the purpose of paying for expenditures, but must pay the extra expenses out of their own pockets, and they have done so. Now, will you not repay them? They made the expenditure expecting that it would be provided for, and if it is not done in this deficiency bill, after fifteen months of delay, it may not be done at all. I have no doubt, however, that it will be done; but this cutting down the bill this year to give this House an air of economy and get past the fall elections, and putting these items over to next winter so that they may be then included in another deficiency bill, is, I submit, a very poor, temporizing, half-way fashion of doing public business. I think we ought to comply with the request of Secretary Bayard, and meet now these expenses which have been already incurred, and pay back this money which has been already paid out for the Government. We provided a governmental machine which we knew would cost $150,000 for contingent expenses and ordered it to go on. We only provided $110,000 for those expenses. Let us honestly pay the balance, $40,000.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary for me to add anything to what has been said. In voting this appropriation the House will be simply carrying out the policy hitherto adopted. I ask for a vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the accounting officers to effect a proper settlement of the accounts of certain consular officers, being deficiencies, as follows: For the fiscal year, 1885, $34,970.35; for the fiscal year, 1884, $2,174.87; in all $37,145.22.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask a vote on that amendment.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment, and I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the difference between the question here and the questions that have been already passed upon. The consuls who created these deficiencies created them by withholding from the Treasury of the United States certain sums of money received by them for fees, and which it was their duty under the law to pay into the Treasury. Instead of paying those fees into the Treasury, as required by law, they withheld them under the pretense that it was necessary to use them in their business or in the consular service, and they now owe the Government that amount of money, and this appropriation is asked to cover what seems to me to be legally the defalcation of these officials.

Mr. HITT. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] say that the members of the consular service have retained these fees without authority of law? The law of 1884 expressly marks the limit up to which they are allowed to retain and apply to expenditures the fees, and beyond that limit they are required to pay them into the Treasury and pay the expenditures out of their own pockets. They have done this, and the Secretary after examining their accounts sends us this estimate of the deficiency that we owe and ought to repay them.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a plain question: Is it not a fact that these consular officers do receive official fees which they are required by law to cover into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HITT. They are required to pay into the Treasury the fees received above and beyond a certain limit.

Mr. BURNES. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether in these cases under consideration the consuls have not used this money and withheld it from the Treasury, and is not this appropriation sought in order to cover the deficit so made?

Mr. HITT. Not at all. The Secretary of State has reported that these consuls have paid these expenses out of their own pockets, and these very amounts are found to be the amounts due to these officers for expenditures made in lieu of and above the fees they have received and expended. They are required to account for and turn in the fees after they reach a certain limit and pay further expenditures themselves, and they have done it. If I may answer the gentleman specifically in the language of the State Department I will quote these words:

That it is desirable now to meet this deficiency rather than entail upon the consular officers the necessity of personally bearing the expense of maintaining the consular service of the Government for three months and then wait a year afterward for reimbursement, because there generally elapses the period of a year from the close of a fiscal year before the deficiency becomes available. Formerly the burden was not so great, because many of the consuls paid their expenses out of their fees and were embarrassed only by having their accounts suspended until the deficiency appropriation was passed, but under a clause of the deficiency act of 1884 the consuls are not now allowed to so use the fees, and consequently they have to bear the expense out of their own private resources.

And the Secretary then gives this estimate of the deficiency and recommends that it be appropriated. And then he sends this estimate of deficiency here and recommends its payment.

Mr. BELMONT. Is the question of order now under discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order is pending.

Mr. BELMONT. Then I desire to say that there is no question of fees involved in this proposition in any manner. As has been well stated by my friend from Illinois, the deficiency act of 1884 expressly prohibits consuls from using their fees for these purposes; and this deficiency is created by an insufficiency of the allowance for rent, stationery, and postage. The allowance for rent is provided for by section 1706, and is at the rate of 20 per cent. on the salaries of such consuls as receive more than $1,000.

It seems to me that no point of order lies against this proposition, for the simple reason that this committee has already made provision for this purpose for the year 1886. Indeed my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] himself reported from the Committee on Appropriations the bill now before the committee which required an appropriation of $22,000 for this item for 1886. The amendment which I propose relates to 1884 and 1885. If an appropriation of this kind was in order as to 1886, it is equally in order in regard to these two years.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the fund out of which these expenses are paid the Chair has no knowledge, and will therefore rule the amendment in order.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BELMONT was adopted.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire now to renew the amendment I offered a moment ago for the purpose probably of merely renewing an inquiry to the gentlemen who have this matter in charge. In the case to which I refer Benjamin S. Parker retained from the fees under the statute which has been referred to $186.71. Upon an accounting with the proper Department it was found that more than this sum was due him; but as the appropriation was exhausted he was directed to return to the Treasury the sum of $186.71. This was for the year 1885. Mr. Parker was unable to return the money. I entered into a correspondence with the Comptroller of the Treasury, requesting him to wait until Congress should act on the matter, which he kindly consented to do.

Now, in this case the consul has not paid the money into the Treasury, but has retained it; and my amendment proposes that in a settlement with the Treasury Department he be allowed this sum as an offset to any balance that may stand against him as due the United States. If he had paid this money he would be entitled now to receive it back. If he had paid it, he simply asks that in the accounting between him-Not havingasury Department the sum may be allowed to him. The and the Treish to ask is whether Mr. Parker's case is covered by the question I wwhich have already been adopted.

Mr. BELMONT. I understand Mr. Parker's case to be a deficiency for the year 1885.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELMONT. Then it would be covered by the second amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. He not having paid the money into the Treasury?

Mr. CANNON. I think the amendment covers it.

Mr. BURNES. I suggest that the gentleman from Indiana, in order to make the matter certain, had better ask unanimous consent to insert in the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] the words "including the account of Benjamin S. Parker," &c.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, I ask unanimous consent that in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York there be inserted, after the word "officers," these words:

Including the account of Benjamin S. Parker, late consul at Sherbrooke, for $186.71.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection; and the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse T. McF. Patton, United States consul at Osaka and Hiogo, Japan, amount expended by him for salary of interpreter to that consulate for the third quarter of 1884, being for the service of the fiscal year 1885, $125.

Mr. GILFILLAN. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

To reimburse C. C. Andrews, late United States consul-general at Rio de Janeiro, the amount expended by him for clerk-hire in excess of the amount allowed by law during the year ending September 1, 1883, $600.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is for the purpose of supplying a deficiency in the fund provided for the payment of clerk-hire at this consulate. The claim has been examined and an appropriation of this amount is recommended by the Secretary of State in a letter which has been transmitted here by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which I hold in my hand. I believe the amendment is not opposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore I will not occupy time in discussing the merits of the question.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 61, noes 34.

The Clerk read as follows:

Loss on bills of exchange, consular service: To reimburse Alexander C. Jones, late United States consul of Nagasaki, Japan, the amount paid by him for the loss by exchange on drafts which were returned to him unpaid, being for the service of the fiscal year 1885, $55.52.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the accounting officers, without the payment of any money from the Treasury, to reimburse appropriations for the consular service 1885 the amount of loss on bills of exchange paid from said appropriations, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, $1,387.90.

Mr. BURNES. I trust my friend from New York [Mr. BELMONT] will accept an amendment to his proposition; otherwise we publish to the world what seems to be a fraud on its face. I suggest that the gentleman strike out the words "without the payment of any money from the Treasury." Those words relate to the balancing of the accounts, and they show on their face what I do not like the world to see—that we are allowing credit for money which has been withheld. Such a thing does not look well in a public document.

Mr. BELMONT. I see no objection to the gentleman's suggestion. I will only say that the wording of the amendment was taken from the estimates as they have been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURNES. That is true.

Mr. BELMONT. I am perfectly willing to accept the gentleman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York modify his amendment by striking out the words indicated—"without the payment of any money from the Treasury?"

Mr. BELMONT. I do.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 154 as follows:
"Miscellaneous: To refund to James M. Hagar, managing owner of the American ship St. James, the sum improperly exacted from said ship by the United States consular agent at Bremerhaven, Germany, under protest of the master, and covered into the Treasury, said exaction having been held to be illegal by the United States minister at Berlin, which decision was affirmed by the State Department, $1,112.75.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say simply in reference to this matter that the Committee on Claims at this session have investigated this matter, and find the facts to be as stated. They had before them the communication of the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, saying that this amount had been exacted, and illegally exacted. It had further, sir, the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that the money had been covered into the Treasury. It would have been paid back at once had it not been covered into the Treasury. As it was, there was no fund out of which payment could be made. It is in the nature, therefore, of an adjudicated amount. As it was paid into the Treasury, it could not be refunded except by appropriation. It therefore properly belongs in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regards it as out of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Upon what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. That it is not an audited amount.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has been examined and audited by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the Chair rule the amendment out?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DINGLEY. It stands exactly on the same ground as more than a dozen paragraphs of the bill reported by that committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman take an appeal?

Mr DINGLEY. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will simply say on the point of order, because I think there is a misapprehension of the amendment, that it appears from the communication of the Secretary of State this amount of $1,112 was illegally exacted at Bremerhaven, and paid under protest. Appeal was taken to our minister at Berlin, and the exaction was declared to have been illegal. The Secretary of State confirmed that decision. On application to refund the money it was decided, the amount having been covered into the Treasury, appropriation was necessary. It seems to me on that statement of facts this should be considered as an audited claim and the amendment as in order to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine and the Chair differ as to what the word audited means.

Mr. BELMONT. I am obliged to offer this amendment, as it seems to be an omission in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

To meet a deficiency in the salaries of consular officers, not citizens of the United States, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, $4,000.

Mr. BELMONT. The reason for this amendment is that, by recent changes in these consulates, vice-consuls, not citizens of the United States, have been compelled to take charge of the consulates, and it has been discovered that the Secretary of State did not have at his disposal an amount sufficient to meet the requirements of the service. I ask the communication of the Secretary be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 14, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of letter of the Secretary of State of the 13th instant, in relation to the insufficiency of the appropriation for "salaries of consular officers not citizens of the United States" for the current fiscal year, and submitting an estimate of $4,000 to supply the deficiency therein.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 13, 1886.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 7th instant, relative to the insufficiency of the appropriation for "salaries of consular officers not citizens," I have the honor to request you to submit to Congress an estimate of $4,000 additional for the year 1886, to be included in the deficiency bill.

The $6,000 appropriated, as you are aware, has usually been sufficient, but during the present fiscal year so many changes have been made in the consular service, causing consulates to be left in charge of vice-consuls who are not citizens of the United States, that this appropriation became exhausted in April, 1886, before all the drafts drawn for salary for the first quarter 1886 were paid.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. I move the following amendment:

Page 7, amend by inserting after line 154 as follows: To meet a deficiency in the salaries of chargés d'affaires ad interim for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, $8,100.

Mr. BURNES. I apprehend this is not subject to the point of order, but I ask both sides of the House to vote it down. This is a worthless, soft service, and I do trust that is something this House will vote out of this bill.

Mr. BELMONT. This is to provide compensation for those officials of the United States who are now at their posts of duty. In the case of Vienna, where we have no representative, the secretary of legation is entitled to one-half of the pay of the minister during the period of vacancy.

But during that period he is entitled to no salary as secretary. The statute, which I will read, provides (section 1685, Revised Statutes):

For such time as any secretary of legation shall be lawfully authorized to act as chargé d'affaires ad interim at the post to which he shall have been appointed he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate allowed by law for a chargé d'affaires at such post; but he shall not be entitled to receive for such time the compensation allowed for his services as secretary of legation.

In the various changes which have taken place, as I have already explained earlier in this discussion, lately this item has been increased. I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the committee with the further reading of communications from the Department, but I will ask leave to have it printed in connection with the amendment which I have offered.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 7, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of State of the 5th instant, in which he submits the necessity for an urgent appropriation of $8,100 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for salaries of chargés d'affaires ad interim for the current fiscal year, to meet drafts drawn on this account, some of which have already been presented and payment refused for want of funds.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 5, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to ask that Congress be requested to provide in the deficiency bill for the payment of salaries of chargés d'affaires ad interim for the current fiscal year the sum of $8,100, to meet the settlement of accounts and payments of drafts now held, and other drafts on this account for said services during the current month, which will be presented for payment early after the 30th instant. It is hoped that in order to protect the drafts now held, and to preserve the credit of the Government and its officers, the necessary appropriation to pay them and others will be promptly made. The appropriation for the current fiscal year is only $12,000, and we have just been able from the reception of the accounts to ascertain that there will be a deficiency for this service of at least the amount stated above.

The accounts received are as follows:

Name.	Station.	Amounts.
J. F. Lee	Vienna, Austria	$4,467 33
D. L. Pringle	Guatemala City	1,156 41
C. M. Seibert	Santiago, Chili	458 34
E. J. Smithers	Peking, China	1,562 85
G. C. Foulk	Seoul, Corea	1,875 00
J. L. Morgan	Mexico City, Mexico	744 50
R. R. Neill	Lima, Peru	40 76
G. W. Wurts	St. Petersburg, Russia	594 43
E. H. Strobel	Madrid, Spain	1,842 43
W. C. Emmet	Constantinople, Turkey	1,427 54
Total		14,169 59

To which add for outstanding drafts and drafts to be drawn at the close of the current month the following:

Name.	Station.	Amount.
J. F. Lee	Vienna, Austria	$1,505 50
G. C. Foulk	Seoul, Corea	625 00
J. L. Morgan	Mexico City, Mexico	312 00
Chapman Coleman	Berlin, Germany	721 10
V. O. King	Bogota, Colombia	360 58
Henri Vignaud	Paris, France	961 53
Total		5,928 01

It is earnestly desired, in order to avoid the mortification of diplomatic officers (as heretofore stated) and the discredit of this Government by the return of their drafts dishonored, that the appropriation be made available immediately.

Although I am aware that it is now very late to be asking you to apply to Congress for an appropriation, still, as it was impossible for me to ascertain earlier what would be the condition of the appropriation at the end of the year, and as the deficiency bill has not yet been reported from the committee, I trust that I am sufficiently in time.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand this amount to be due?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir, it is due now; and further I will say that there are at the State Department a number of protested drafts——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not ask with the hope of influencing the House. They are not in the habit of paying debts that are due.

Mr. BELMONT. This is due, and I hope the amendment will be adopted. I ask a vote upon it.

Mr. HITT. Before the vote is taken I would like to answer an assertion made by the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. BURNES] that the officers performing this duty have a "soft and worthless" service. When these gentlemen perform the duty of chargé d'affaires they perform a laborious duty, and it is one that is so far from being soft that it generally beggars them for the rest of the year, unless they happen to have private means of their own by which they can support these extraordinary expenses as chargés entirely independent of the salary they receive from the Government.

It is a laborious and responsible duty that they discharge, the duty of both minister and secretary of legation, and it has been made more exacting recently by reason of the changes that have taken place in the Government since the change in the political head. The amendment proposes to pay nothing that has not been customary and provided by law heretofore, and this duty has been recognized for fifty years as necessary, important, and laborious.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BELMONT; and there were on a division—ayes 68, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk of the House may arrange the different items that have been put into the bill under proper heads. They have been put in at irregular places and at intervals, and it will be almost impossible to pursue them unless they are rearranged.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman apply that request to the entire bill?

Mr. BURNES. Only to the State Department.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BURNES. I now call the attention of my friend from Tennessee [Mr TAYLOR] to the fact that I promised him to be heard.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after line 1590.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINDINGS OR AWARDS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the following-named persons the sums respectively found due them by the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883, and duly reported by said court to Congress, namely:

To Mary A. Blackwell, $940.
To John M. Campbell, $1,046.50.
To Anna M. Cogswell, $3,884.
To Elizabeth P. Dyer, $480.
To Newitt Harris, $600.
To David H. Hildebrand, $1,078.
To Horace P. Hobson, administrator of John O. Graves, deceased, $3,231.
To Indiana E. Hughes, administratrix of John P. Hughes, deceased, $1,436.
To James C. Jenkins, administrator of Thomas C. Jenkins, $1,275.
To Sarah McFerrin, administratrix of Robert Waters, deceased, $1,752.
To Sarah E. Mendenhall, administratrix of F. M. Mendenhall, deceased, $583.73.
To the administrator of John A. Oursler, deceased, $2,439.10.
To Thomas F. Perkins, administrator of Eliza M. Dawson, deceased, $19,237.68.
To John B. Reid, $1,000.
To Robert H. Walton, $330.
To Americus V. Warr, administrator of Nicholas H. Isbell, deceased, $13,475.15.
To John R. Watkins, administrator of Matilda W. Anderson, deceased, $2,530.
To Elizabeth Griggs, administratrix of Charles Murphy, deceased, $3,187.
To James Tucker, $500.
To Henry Bazsinskey, administrator of Abraham Bazsinskey, deceased, $25,128.
To Robert Smith, $510.
To Alexander Moffatt, $12,442.98.
To the Corporation of Roman Catholic Clergymen of the State of Maryland, the sum of $1,035.50.

Mr. BURNES. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman please state what is his point of order?

Mr. BURNES. I reserve it in order to enable the gentleman from Tennessee to give an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. These are claims that have been approved by the Court of Claims, and referred to Congress in pursuance of law for appropriation by Congress to pay them. I can not see any difference between these claims and those admitted under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] for damages by the overflowage of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. I have a certificate from the clerk of the Court of Claims certifying that these awards or findings of the court had been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is that there is no law authorizing the payment of these claims. These, if I understand the gentleman from Tennessee correctly, are claims that have been referred to the Court of Claims under the act of 1883, known as the Bowman law. That act, as the Chair will remember, provides for the reference by a committee of either House of Congress of any pending claim to the Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, and the court is required simply to report the facts to Congress.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. And the amounts due, which they have done.

Mr. HOLMAN. They report the facts to the House or the Senate, as the case may be, with a recommendation of course. There is no law for their payment. The report is referred as a matter of course to the proper committee for consideration, and facts are furnished on which to predicate a bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment states, as I understand, that these are cases reported by the Court of Claims under the Bowman act.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Yes, sir. I can not see any difference between them and the claims for damages on which the Committee of the Whole acted favorably on Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The difference, as it seems to the Chair, between this and the case to which the gentleman alludes is this, that in the former case a judgment was rendered against the United States, while under the Bowman act the Court of Claims can not render a judgment. It simply makes a report.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I do not understand that it is such a judgment that an execution would be issued if it were against a private individual. But the amounts have been fixed and everything done to show the liability of the Government. It is an amount the Government owes and has not paid, and it does not seem likely that it ever will be paid unless we can get it passed on some bill of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be very proper to pass a bill for the payment of these claims, but it is not in order to put them on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know, and I ask the question for information, if any of these claims have been certified before or not.

A MEMBER. Some of them have been.

Mr. CANNON. There ought to be some way provided by which these appropriations can be made when the claims have undergone judicial investigation, either as we dispose of the 4th of July claims or in some other way.

Mr. BURNES. Is not the proper course for that tribunal when it has investigated the cases to send them back with its report to the respective committees?

The CHAIRMAN. At any rate the Chair holds that the amendment is out of order on this bill.

Mr. BURNES. I ask leave to submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 64, line 1569, after the word "cents," insert: "Anne H. Elliott, $505.93, and Emily Elliott, $505.93;" and in lines 1569, 1570, 1571, in lieu of the sum proposed, insert $683,228.12.

Mr. BURNES. I ask to have read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting those claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 6, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that on the 11th day of May, 1885, the Court of Claims gave judgment against the United States in favor of Anne H. Elliott for $505.93 and in favor of Emily Elliott for $505.93, both of which said judgments were presented to-day for payment.

It would seem proper that they should be inserted in the general deficiency bill.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. N. BURNES,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BURNES. Unless there be something else that has been passed over or unless we are under obligations to some member, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. GUENTHER. When I offered the amendment with regard to the overflow damages the last five items failed to give the amount of the judgments, and instead of that gave the amount of the costs. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be corrected as to these five names, so that it will read:

Wilhelmina Retz, $75; Andrew Kewitz, $100; G. Liebenhaur, $200; David Evans, $500; Frederick Hault, $240.

I simply substitute the amounts of the awards for the costs. I have the consent of the chairman of the subcommittee that this change shall be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] asks unanimous consent to make the correction which he has indicated.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9726) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for prior years, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 503) relating to the Supreme Court of Montana Territory, and providing for the establishment of judicial districts in the Territory; and

A bill (S. 2592) to amend and correct the act approved June 1, 1886, granting a pension to J. H. Thornburg.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1800) to secure the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands under the act of March 3, 1883.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had adopted a resolution transmitting, in compliance with the request of the House, an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1526) amending sections 4756 and 4757 of the Revised Statutes, relating to pensions and to certain disabled persons who have served in the Navy or Marine Corps.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing and distribution of the annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House of Representatives requesting the President of the United States to return to the House the bill (H. R. 3701) granting a pension to Daniel J. Bingman.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will indicate the amendments on which they desire to have separate votes.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the session to-day be extended until 6 o'clock, or until this bill is completed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

A MEMBER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Are there any amendments upon which a separate vote is demanded?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir; there are several.

Mr. TURNER. I ask a separate vote on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], making an allowance of $1,000 in connection with some former election contest in regard to members of the House from the State of Iowa.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask a separate vote on the amendment giving an extra month's pay to the employés of the House.

Mr. BURNES. On page 72 there is an amendment in regard to the funding of taxes illegally collected from railroads upon which I am instructed to ask a separate vote. Also an amendment on page 98; also an amendment on page 65, in relation to the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

Mr. BRAGG. That is for the payment of judgments.

Mr. HOLMAN. On page 110 there is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] upon which a separate vote is desired.

Mr. BURNES. I will call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] to the fact that he was to ask for a separate vote upon the item for the compensation of California members in the contested-election cases.

Mr. MORROW. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it is exactly proper that I should ask a vote on that, one way or the other. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] can state whether a separate vote is desired or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was not reported to the House, I believe. I think there was an agreement that the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] might move to amend the proposition submitted by the committee.

Mr. MORROW. As I understood it, the agreement was about this: The Committee on Appropriations recommended an appropriation of $650; there was also a proposition that the amount should be $1,000 or $1,150. As to that proposition the right to have a separate vote if desired was reserved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] stated when the arrangement was suggested that the amendment could be made to cover any sum that we might desire to move.

Mr. LOWRY. The amendment offered by my colleague on the Committee on Elections [Mr. TURNER], providing the sum of $650 for the expenses of the California delegation, was adopted on a vote by the voice. A division was called for, and it was also adopted in that way. A vote by tellers was then asked for, and while that vote was in progress it was agreed that the amendment appropriating $650 should be adopted by the Committee of the Whole with leave for the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] to move an amendment in the House to make the amount $1,150.

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman is mistaken. The amendment offered by me was adopted by a majority on the vote by tellers. It was not agreed to pro forma.

Mr. MORROW. The gentleman from Georgia is correct about that.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair desires to ascertain is whether it was understood that there might be an amendment offered to that amendment so as to make the amount $1,150.

Mr. LOWRY. That was the understanding, and there is substantially no difference between the statement of my friend the chairman of the Committee on Elections and that which I have made. The difference is that I understood that the vote by tellers had not been completed, but his understanding is that it was completed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the understanding has been correctly stated, but I do not desire to press that amendment and I shall not ask a separate vote.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, except those on which separate votes were demanded, were then agreed to.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the first amendment upon which a separate vote is asked.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to an item upon which a separate vote is asked, the allowance to the widow of a former member of this House from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. There is no separate vote asked by the gentleman from Iowa upon that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has asked a separate vote upon it, and I owe it to the House to correct the statement which I made when the amendment was offered.

I was then under the impression, and I stated, that the amount of the allowance recommended by the Committee on Elections when I was chairman of that committee was greater than the amount provided in the amendment offered to this bill. That was a mistake. The amount recommended by the Committee on Elections of the Forty-sixth Congress in this case was $750, and that amount was disallowed, as were the allowances in the other two cases, by a vote of 75 in the affirmative to 77 in the negative.

Mr. TURNER. Then, if the gentleman will pardon the inquiry, I understand him to state that the allowance of $750 in this case was voted down by the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. It was recommended by the Committee on Elections, but was voted down by the House.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on which a separate vote was demanded was read, as follows:

After line 633 insert the following:

"For payment of bills as follows: Being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1885, June 10, 1885, Old Colony Steamboat Company, for transportation of enlisted men from New York to Newport, $127; May 27, 1885, Old Colony Steamboat Company, for transportation of enlisted men from New York to Newport, $162; June 1, 1885, Pacific Mail Steamship Company, transportation of enlisted men from New York to San Francisco, $493.50; June 24, 1885, Pacific Mail Steamship Company, transportation of enlisted men from San Francisco to New York, $4,935; April 7, 1885, Pacific Mail Steampship Company, transportation of enlisted men from New York to Aspinwall (Panama expedition), $1,600; May 20, 1885, Pacific Mail Steamship Company, transportation of enlisted men from Aspinwall to New York (Panama expedition), $1,170. Total, $8,487.50.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 91, noes 95.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 93, not voting 113; as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 7, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has just called my attention to the fact that the Journal shows that the two bills I reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary, one the bill (H. R. 4849) to punish robbery in the Indian Territory, and the other the bill (H. R. 5188) prescribing the punishment of horse-stealing in the Indian Territory, were indefinitely postponed. I reported as a substitute a bill containing the substantial provisions of both the other bills in lieu of them. I intended instead of having those two bills indefinitely postponed to offer the provisions of one of the bills that was reported from the Judiciary Committee as a substitute, and not have these bills indefinitely postponed. In other words, I want the original bill that was reported from the committee to be considered with a House bill and put its provisions after the enacting clause of one of the House bills which was referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the clause of the Journal in relation to the matter.

Mr. DAWES. I call the Senator's attention to the RECORD, which also says that the bills were indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VEST. I did not read the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will note wherein the Journal is wrong as the Secretary reads, and the correction will be made. The clause of the Journal relating to the bills referred to will be read.

The Secretary read from the Journal of yesterday's proceedings as follows:

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment and that they ought not to pass:

A bill (H. R. 4849) to punish robbery in the Indian Territory; and

A bill (H. R. 5188) prescribing the punishment of horse-stealing in the Indian Territory, Ordered, That they be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (S. 2808) to punish robbery and horse-stealing in the Indian Territory; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the journal entry.

Mr. VEST. My object was to report back the two House bills which were referred to the committee and then to move to strike out all after the enacting clause of one of those bills (I am not particular which one) and insert the provisions of the bill reported from the committee as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to reconsider the action of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I move, then, to reconsider the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the action of the Senate yesterday on the reports made by the Senator from Missouri will be reconsidered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bills be placed on the Calendar, and then when we reach one it can be taken up and the committee bill moved as an amendment.

Mr. VEST. That can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee. The Journal is correct. The Chair understood the request of the Senator from Missouri at the time as stated in the Journal.

Mr. VEST. Yes; I overlooked it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings will stand approved, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of 86 citizens of Richmond, Va.; the petition of Charles Bansell and 265 other citizens of the eighteenth Congressional district of Ohio, and the petition of Max Bergman and 78 other citizens of the tenth Congressional district of Ohio, praying for the passage of the following measures at the present session of Congress:

1. House bill No. 7887, repealing timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts;

2. House bill No. 7021, for adjustment of railroad and other land grants;

3. Bills forfeiting all railroad and land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with;

4. House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma;

5. Senate bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement;

6. Bill prohibiting aliens from holding land in the United States;

7. Bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays, and prohibiting bribery;

8. Bill directing disbursements of at least $200,000,000 Treasury surplus, and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of S. J. Boies and 125 others of the second Congressional district of Maine, the petition of C. A. Thompson and 100 others of the second Congressional district of Maine, the petition of Charles F. Tebbetts and 101 others of the first Congressional district of Maine, the petition of John H. French and 45 others of the first Congressional district of Maine, and the petition of George Porter and 100 others of the first Congressional district of Maine, praying for the passage at the present session of Congress of the following measures:

1. House bill No. 7887, repealing timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts;

2. House bill No. 7021, for adjustment of railroad and other land grants;

3. Bills forfeiting all railroad and land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with;

4. House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma;

5. Senate bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement;

6. Bill prohibiting aliens from holding land in the United States;

7. Bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays, and prohibiting bribery;

8. Bill directing disbursements of at least $200,000,000 Treasury surplus, and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of farmers of Oswego County, New York, and a petition of consumers of butter, of Otsego County, New York, praying for the passage of the bill taxing all imitations of butter; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I present several petitions, numerously signed by citizens of Kansas, of the character which have heretofore been presented to the Senate in large numbers, and which I observe have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

I wish to say that that reference is an entire mistake. There is no possible warrant for these petitions having gone to that committee, because every single subject which the petitions refer to which is germane to the jurisdiction of that committee has been passed upon by the committee and reported to the Senate; and in a number of cases the bills have passed the Senate and are pending in the other House, or else have passed both Houses.

The House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma, if it came over here, would not go to the Committee on Public Lands, but it would go to the Committee on Indian Affairs; that is to say, judging by the practice heretofore.

The bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement has already passed the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Twice.

Mr. PLUMB. It has twice passed the Senate, as the Senator from Iowa reminds me, and it is now pending in the House of Representatives.

As to a bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays and punishing bribery, there is no such bill that I know of, but at all events if there was it would not go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill directing a disbursement of at least $200,000,000 of Treasury surplus and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired, an object with which I am generally in sympathy, I am sorry to say would not go to the Committee on Public Lands, but would go to the Committee on Finance. That is the only measure of any importance named in the petitions which has been or is now pending in the Senate which has not received consideration at the hands either of a committee or of the Senate.

I therefore suggest that these petitions should go to the Committee on Finance, and I will ask that the reference which has been heretofore made of these petitions be changed so that all such petitions may be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the petitions presented by the Senator from Kansas will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

A petition of J. W. Cessna and 120 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of J. M. Bannan and 294 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of James A. Barr and 542 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of W. H. Talbot and 24 other citizens of the fourth Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of James L. Otterman and 120 citizens of the fourth Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of V. C. Spencer and 331 other citizens of the fourth Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of W. V. Berry and 215 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of E. H. Fuller and 164 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of James Taylor and 26 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Kansas;

A petition of McMillan Renick and 487 other citizens of the second Congressional district of Kansas; and

A petition of F. P. Lewis and 235 other citizens of the first Congressional district of Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I also ask that similar petitions heretofore presented which have gone to the Committee on Public Lands be changed to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Committeen on Public Lands will be discharged from the further consideration of such petitions and they will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition from a person for whose benefit Congress has at this session passed a bill granting a pension, and which pension bill has been vetoed by the President. I ask that his own statement about the matter, in the shape of a petition, may be read, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

To the honorable Congress of the United States:

I, John S. Kirkpatrick, your petitioner, would respectfully say that it has just come to my knowledge that the President has vetoed the bill recently passed by Congress requiring my name to be placed on the pension-roll.

I take this early opportunity to ask you to do a small act of justice and pass the bill over the veto. It would be no discourtesy to the President to do so, for it is evident that in this case he had relinquished his office and made himself merely the mouth-piece for some quill-driving slave of routine of that circumlocution shop the Pension Office. Had he read the papers in the case he never would have been so silly as to speak of it as he does.

The circumstances in my case are peculiar. At the time I became injured I was many hundreds of miles away from my company and practically alone, and did not rejoin the company for nearly four months thereafter, consequently few knew of my injury. Our company was made up of men from seventeen States and many foreign countries and became widely scattered. Ten years' searching has enabled me to find only three of the old members, and they know nothing that could be of any use in this case.

In November, 1882, I sent an affidavit to the Pension Office in which I stated that I had no more proof to offer, and asked the office to allow the claim or reject it on the proof then offered. I have ceased to seek for proof, believing it to be useless.

I do not think it was the intent of the law that it should be administered so as to compel a man to bankrupt himself in order to sustain a just claim. I believe that the rule of the Pension Office requiring direct proof, is the cause of most of the frauds in the pension business.

I could have satisfied the requirements of the Pension Office years ago by dividing the money with men who would have sworn to the best advantage and stuck to it, but I prefer defeat to fraud.

All of our company officers are dead. The President could probably understand the difficulty of obtaining their evidence.

Had there been any probability of my obtaining testimony I would not have risked the loss of more than twenty years of back pension by appealing to Congress. Had I not been disabled I would have remained in the Army longer, as the $800 of Government and local bounties then obtainable was a great temptation, as the end of the war was visible.

For nearly twenty-four years I have never for one hour been free from pain. I have striven to live without the aid to which I was justly entitled. My sixty-five years of age notifies me that the end is not far off. I am no longer able to earn a living, and appeal to judgment of Congress as against the malignant injustice of the President.

A victim of the brutal want of system of the American military system, I appeal to you for a fraction of justice. No amount of money would compensate my suffering, but a reasonable amount would add to my comfort. I admit that the proof is meager, but when did genuine courage and endurance take thought to leave a plain trail behind. I throw myself on your mercy. Pass the bill—the Pension Office objections to the contrary—or acknowledge that your pension system is a fraud and a delusion.

And for this I will ever pray.

JOHN S. KIRKPATRICK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, from the Committee on Printing, reports favorably the motion to print 2,000 copies of hearings before the Senate Committee on Fisheries of parties interested in the bill (H. R. 5538) relating to the importing and landing of mackerel caught during the spawning season. The question is upon agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE HAHN.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 199) providing for printing the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Michael Hahn, a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Louisiana, to report in favor of concurring in the resolution, and I ask immediate action thereon.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Michael Hahn, a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Louisiana, 12,500 copies; of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives. And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Michael Hahn to accompany said eulogies; and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following order, and ask for its present consideration:

Ordered, That hereafter during the present session of the Senate the daily hour of meeting be 11 o'clock forenoon until otherwise ordered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the order which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered. If there is any objection to it I shall not press it; but I hope there will not be. It merely relates to getting on with the Calendar.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Ordered, That for the next six days of the legislative sittings of the Senate, after the call for and disposition of resolutions shall have been passed, the time remaining until half past 12 o'clock shall be devoted to the Calendar, beginning with the first case thereon, and every matter objected to shall be passed by, and debate shall be limited to five minutes for any Senator on the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The substance of that—I will explain it—is that notwithstanding the appropriation bills, &c., beginning our sessions an hour earlier, an hour and a half shall be devoted to strict morning business and to what we call unobjected cases, so as to run off all that may be done.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator understand that it shall not be in order to move to consider a bill notwithstanding an objection, under this order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the effect of it; and then having gone through with those bills to which we can all agree unanimously, if there is any time, with the appropriation bills, that can be properly used, I shall propose probably another order, that we shall take up the Calendar of objected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution now. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Does that take effect after to-day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WILLIAM COZZINS.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the action of the Senate in postponing indefinitely the bill (S. 653) granting a pension to William Cozzins may by unanimous consent be reconsidered, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. The petitioner claims that some additional evidence will be filed in the case, and I ask that that action may be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which the bill referred to by him was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, after line 408, the Committee on Commerce report to insert:

For the purchase of the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan ship-canal and harbor of refuge, connecting the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That before said moneys shall be expended, the Secretary of War shall cause an examination to be made by a board of three United States engineers to ascertain and report upon the importance and value of the free use of said ship-canals and harbor of refuge to commerce and navigation and the reasonableness of the price therefor, and shall have received from said board a report favorable to such purchase by the United States; and also upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said harbor of refuge, canals, easement, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances, of every nature, belonging to and connected with said works, or either of them.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment to the amendment in lieu of the item as reported by the committee.

Mr. FRYE. As a substitute for the whole amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out the proposed amendment, and insert in lieu thereof:

For making free of toll to commerce the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan ship-canal, connecting the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have caused an examination to be made by a board of three United States engineers into the importance and value to commerce and navigation of the free use of said ship-canal and unless the report of said board shall be in favor of making said canal free to commerce: And provided further, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied upon investigation as to the actual cost of said canal to said company, and then only so much of said sum shall be expended as the said Secretary shall be satisfied is necessary to reimburse the said company for advances and expenses actually made and incurred in constructing said canal and in maintaining the same over and above the net proceeds of the lands granted by Congress to aid in constructing said canal, and over and above the tolls received therefrom, with interest as provided by the act of Congress making said grant, approved April 10, 1866. And none of said money shall be expended except upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said ship-canal, harbor, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every name and nature pertaining to said work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that offered as a substitute for the pending amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is offered as a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will ask the attention of the Senate upon this item of the bill for only a few moments. Until yesterday I had given no thought whatever to this proposition, for I had not known until I read the bill that it had been considered even by the committee. It has seemed to me that the amendment reported by the committee is perhaps not quite in harmony with the law as to the real ownership or status of this canal.

The amendment as reported by the committee proceeds upon the theory that this canal is owned absolutely by the canal company, and it provides for the purchase from the canal company of the canal as its property.

The act of Congress made a grant to the State of Wisconsin to aid in constructing this canal, which was deemed by the Congress of the United States and by the State of great consequence to commerce. The grant was of 200,000 acres of land to aid the State in completing the canal, and the lands were to be subject to the disposal of the Legislature, or in a contingency named of the governor and other officers, and were to be applied to the construction of the canal, &c., and to no other purpose. It was evidently the theory of the act that the State would itself through a board of public works or otherwise in its sovereign capacity construct the canal, and the State was required to keep an account of the proceeds of the sales of the land and of the cost of constructing, repairing, and operating the canal, &c.

The State of Wisconsin did not see fit to engage as a sovereign, through a board of public works or otherwise, in the construction of this work of public improvement. The State had had some experience, and unfortunate experience, too, in proceeding with the construction of public works in that way. She therefore did what she had a perfect right to do; she chose to execute this trust through the instrumentality of a corporation which she created for that purpose.

It can not justly be claimed that the State of Wisconsin, as was intimated yesterday, violated her obligation to the United States or was in any sense recreant as a trustee, for when the State accepted this grant she became a trustee by choosing to employ a corporation as her agent to execute the trust instead of proceeding in her sovereign capacity to construct the work.

This grant differs in its terms in no essential respect from the grants made by the United States to various States to aid in constructing railroads, and in all those cases it has been admitted (indeed it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Tucker vs. Ferguson, 22 Wallace, 572) that the State in such case does not abdicate her sovereignty by accepting such a trust, but that she may execute it through any instrumentality she sees fit, and she is absolutely free to choose the mode by which she will execute the trust.

So there is no foundation for any reflection upon the honor of the State of Wisconsin in executing this trust, as was suggested yesterday, in that she chose to execute it through the instrumentality of this canal company instead of through a board of public works.

The State conferred this grant upon the company upon condition that it should complete the canal. No matter what the cost to the company might be, whether in excess of the value of lands or not, the company agreed with the State for these lands to complete this work of public improvement. The State was careful in its legislation to see to it that this company should not acquire land except by performing the conditions. It provided that as the work progressed, when the company should have completed one-fourth of the work it might receive one-fourth not simply of acreage but in value of the land, and so on until the work was completed, the company not being entitled to receive and not receiving the last of the lands until the canal was constructed.

The State, careful in the trust, had litigation with this corporation. The corporation sought by its interpretation of the act of the Legislature to acquire more land from the State than it was entitled to in accordance with the spirit of the legislation. The State resisted it, and the supreme court of the State decided that this company could only have land, not by acreage, but upon the basis of value, and the valuation was made by the State as the work progressed, in order that the company might not obtain the best land before completing the work. So the company went on with the work, and when the same was completed, as it confessedly has been completed, in accordance with the act of Congress, except as to the harbor of refuge——

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the breakwater.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir, and the breakwater—the State gave to the company the rest of the lands, and not before.

Mr. President, it would be very foolish for any man understanding even superficially this subject to claim that this company could by any possibility have any ownership in the canal other or different from that which the State would have had if she had chosen to apply this grant to the completion of the work herself. The company has precisely the interest in the canal and the right to the canal as against the United States that the State would have had, and no other or different, because the State by selecting this agent to execute the trust could not vest in the agent any different title from that which the act of Congress vested in her. Now what is it? The act of Congress provided that—

Whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest—

Not compound interest, unless that is lawful—

With legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal, with such interest, the said State shall be allowed to tax for the use of said canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

If the State of Wisconsin had constructed the canal by means of this grant her attitude to the United States would be this: If the proceeds of the sales of these lands had paid for the construction then the State would be at liberty only to impose a toll upon the commerce using the canal adequate to keep it in repair, &c., and the United States would probably have a right at any time, without paying a dollar as I understand it, to take possession of that canal and make it free. If the State had expended $100,000 more than the proceeds of the land then she would have a right until that expenditure was reimbursed to regulate its tolls with reference to her reimbursement as well as with reference to keeping the work in repair, and the United States in that event probably would have a right under the act of Congress to take possession of the work and make it free by paying to the State what she had expended, with legal interest over and above the receipts from the lands and from tolls.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the company has the title in fee acquired from the United States?

Mr. SPOONER. I understand so. Let me read the language of the act of Congress again in answer to a suggestion made by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]:

Whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal.

Then the State shall be allowed to make a tax only for the purpose of keeping the canal in repair; not for any profit whatever.

When the United States had paid this balance to the State of Wisconsin the canal would have cost the State nothing, because the lands in the first place and the moneys which the Government afterward would have paid the State would be equal to the entire cost, including interest. It evidently was not the purpose of the act of Congress that the State of Wisconsin, as I understand it, or its grantee, because its grantee, this company, must stand in the same position exactly as the State would—it was not the intention of the act of Congress that the State or anybody else should make money out of the construction of this work of public improvement, unless possibly in case the lands were more than sufficient to pay for the work.

The difference between the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce and the amendment which I submit is this: In the first place, the amendment which I offer to the committee's amendment does not in terms recognize this canal company as the owner of this work of improvement and does not propose to purchase it. It simply contemplates what it seems to me the act of Congress contemplated, the making free to commerce of this canal by reimbursing the State or, what is the same thing, the grantee of the State, such sum of money as the Secretary of War, making such careful investigation as he may be advised is best, shall find the company has expended over and above the receipts from the lands and the tolls.

Mr. DAWES. Getting the title of the company?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir; a conveyance of whatever title it has to the canal. That is a quitclaim. This is a matter of precaution. It will forever set at rest any question as to the title if the United States should make this payment. I think that provision, as a matter of strict law, is perhaps not necessary, but I think it is certainly wise.

Under the amendment as I propose it nothing is to be paid in excess of the $150,000 in any event, and nothing is to be paid either until this board of experts has examined into the question of the advisability of making this canal free and has reported in favor of it. Again, nothing is to be paid until the Secretary of War has ascertained the actual cost, by means to be employed by him, of this canal, and nothing is to be paid even then except so much as shall be necessary to reimburse this company fairly for its expenditures in excess of its receipts from the lands and tolls, with legal interest, which the act of Congress as originally passed provides for.

I never saw these accounts until they were read here yesterday. The State of Wisconsin is in no wise committed to their accuracy. They are, if proposed as a basis for the purchase of this property by the United States, a fair subject of the criticism made upon them by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I know the two gentlemen whose names are signed to them, Jesse Spalding, the president of this company, and General William E. Strong, its treasurer. They are both men of high character in the State of Illinois where they live, and men well known in the State of Wisconsin, and men whose honor would not be impeached or impeachable except by competent and very strong testimony. One was a gallant officer in the army for the suppression of the rebellion and a man of whose reputation the State of Wisconsin is proud; the other, the president of that company, is a man whom I have known for years, and he is a man of great ability and one in whose integrity I have implicit confidence.

There are items in these accounts that the Government of the United States never would agree to pay. This is a statement of what this company "expected" or would ask the Government to pay in order to make this canal free. They have put in compound interest, which under some circumstances, perhaps, they might be allowed to charge. They have put in the item of salaries; they have put items of discount in their statement; but every item, as I remember, which they have put there shows upon its face what it is and invites criticism upon it; but there is no good foundation for saying, notwithstanding these accounts may be open to criticism, that they are "cooked" or fraudulent.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will allow me to say that the accounts show the expenditure of one hundred and seventy-eight thousand and some dollars, and the bill of the committee limits the purchase to $150,000, taking off all the charges that might be questioned.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendment which I propose leaves out of view this account, and provides for the ascertainment by the Secretary of War in his own way, independent of this account, of the amount which this property has cost over and above the amount received from the sales of the lands granted, and from tolls, &c.

Something has been said about the failure of the State of Wisconsin to build the breakwater and the harbor of refuge, as if that were a breach of trust on the part of the State. Long ago the Congress of the United States, and it was competent for Congress to so do, relieved the State of Wisconsin, as I understand it, from the performance of that part of its contract, and undertook itself, so important did it regard this work of improvement, to construct the harbor of refuge, and made expenditures upon the breakwater. I do not know whether that was upon the request of the State of Wisconsin or not, but it was done by the Congress of the United States, and constitutes no ground for any imputation upon the honor of that State.

Something, too, has been said by way of belittling this improvement; that it is a small canal made for the purpose of facilitating the transactions of a few lumbermen. That was not the view of Congress when this grant was made in 1866; that has not been the view of the State of Wisconsin; that is not the view of the people who have occasion to navigate that lake and to use this canal or who live in the country tributary to it.

Wisconsin in 1879 investigated by a legislative committee the transactions of this company. I have that report in my hand. It is very carefully prepared. I know the men who signed it. I believe it is accurate and worthy of credence; and as bearing upon the importance of this work to commerce I ask the attention of the Senate a moment to a quotation from this report:

"The magnitude of the commerce of Green Bay," laughed at here yesterday, "is not generally realized."

Mr. MILLER. Laughed at by whom?

Mr. SPOONER. Laughed at not by you.

In the year 1870 the imports were $25,000,000 and the exports $65,000,000. There has doubtless been a large increase since that year, as the very important iron industry of the Green Bay country has almost wholly come into existence within that period.

Statistics show that fully two-thirds of the exports of Green Bay are to the ports of Milwaukee and Chicago.

That is not true to-day exactly.

In 1870 there were shipped from the bay 500,000,000 feet of lumber, 900,000,000 shingles, 340,000,000 laths, 35,000,000 pickets, 2,500,000 railroad ties, 1,600,000 cedar posts, and 650,000 telegraph poles, besides many other important articles of export.

From the records of the light-house keeper on Green Island—

Who was not interested in "cooking" up any accounts for this company or making any false showing as to the commerce of that region—which is directly opposite the entrance of Sturgeon Bay, it appears that nearly seven thousand vessels passed the light last year, the great majority of which would have found their way to and from Lake Michigan by the Sturgeon Bay Canal had it been in operation.

That canal, short as it is, saves, I am told, about 80 miles of navigation, some of it exceedingly dangerous in its character.

The importance of the work has been greatly enhanced by the location of a harbor of refuge by the National Government at the eastern outlet of the canal.

This harbor is designed to afford an accessible and safe port in a storm, and vessels entering within the inclosure of the breakwater can pass through the canal into Sturgeon Bay, where the most perfect security is afforded.

This harbor is the only one of the kind on the lakes. It was rendered necessary by the long reach—

I ask the attention of Senators to this—

It was rendered necessary by the long reach of dangerous coast south of Death's Door. The harbor was first located at Ahnepee, but afterward changed to Sturgeon Bay, because it could be constructed at the latter point for about $180,000, or one-half the expense necessary at Ahnapee, and besides a much better and more commodious harbor would be secured. In the year 1878 the number of vessels that cleared from the port of Chicago was 10,494, and about 9,000 cleared from the port of Milwaukee.

The majority of these vessels pass by that part of the lake where the harbor of refuge named could be accessible in case of storm, and its construction would doubtless cause a great reduction in the number of wrecks which the history of navigation in the northern part of Lake Michigan has recorded.

The importance of that work to commerce should not be underestimated. The State of Wisconsin is not here asking Congress to purchase these works. The Legislature of Wisconsin has passed no memorial to Congress asking for this expenditure so far as I remember; therefore I had not investigated this subject and had no knowledge of it except in a general way as a citizen of that State. This company has asked neither my colleague nor myself for any such appropriation. I do not know that they desire the passage of this amendment or that any effort be made to make free this canal. I do not know but they prefer it should remain as it is. They are receiving about $14,000 a year, I think, from tolls. I never was in that region but once, and that was within the last two years; but I know that the people of that country, not connected in any way with this company or with any of its transactions, are begging that this canal be made free.

If, as stated yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] and by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], it is the settled policy of the Government of the United States, as it ought to be, to make free all such works to the commerce of the country, to strike from the statute-book every authority to levy tolls upon vessels having occasion to use these public works, then it is only right that Congress should take measures, not to buy this canal at a fabulous price, but to make it free by paying to this company, not on the basis of these accounts, but such sum as the Secretary of War shall ascertain to be necessary to reimburse the company for its actual fair advances made, with legal interest, over and above the receipts from tolls and from the sale of the lands.

It is with this view that I offer this amendment, and I have said what I have said in part to vindicate my State from the imputation which was cast upon it yesterday as to its execution of this trust. The only thing, so far as I can see, that Wisconsin has been remiss in as a trustee is that she has failed to keep as careful a guard over the expenditures and transactions of the corporation as the act of Congress required. In that respect she has been wanting and in no other, and in her failure to require an annual public showing of these corporate transactions she has only followed the example of Congress and many other States in their relations to corporations which have received land grants and other governmental aid.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I see but little difference between the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, except that it may be that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin would render the question of accounting a little more accurate. The amendment of the committee says nothing in regard to how the accounting is to be made and leaves it entirely to the Secretary of War to be satisfied that the sum is not an exorbitant sum.

The Senator from Wisconsin makes one statement in regard to this matter which I am not able to agree with. It is, if I recall his words correctly, to the effect that neither the State of Wisconsin nor this company have any actual ownership of this property, that they accepted a trust from the United States and are simply holding the canal in trust, and that the United States Government can at any time by reimbursing the State or the company for all its expenditures beyond the amount received from the sales of lands take this canal into its own possession. I think that is scarcely correct. I think the giving of this land by the United States Government to the State of Wisconsin conveyed with it an absolute and perfect title to this canal for all time to come. I do not see how any other construction can be put upon the language of the act of Congress; and it simply limits that ownership to the collection of such tolls as shall be necessary for all time to come to maintain the canal in perfect order.

Mr. DAWES. Please read it.

Mr. MILLER. I will read that portion of it in order that we may see how the Government is to get control of it. I read from the act of Congress:

> And whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal, with such interest, the said State shall be allowed to tax for the use of said canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

If the United States decides at any time to step in and reimburse the State of Wisconsin or its agent for the moneys that it has expended over and above the moneys received from the sale of lands and from the use of the canal in tolls, then at that point it can say to the State of Wisconsin, "You shall hereafter charge only a sufficient rate of toll to maintain the canal in repair." There is no provision here for the Federal Government taking the canal into its own ownership. It belongs exclusively to the State of Wisconsin or to its agent.

Mr. DAWES. Where does the statute say that?

Mr. MILLER. The statute gives this land to the State of Wisconsin to aid the State in building this canal, and it says that when it shall have reimbursed itself for all expenses, or if the United States Government shall step in and pay any balance, then the United States may say to the State of Wisconsin and will say to it, "Hereafter the State of Wisconsin shall charge only such rates of tolls as will keep the canal in repair forever." There is no proposition in this act of Congress that I can find which implies that the United States can at any time possess itself of the canal by paying this balance; but it can compel the State of Wisconsin to forever maintain it at such rate of toll as will pay for its maintenance; and therefore the United States can only get control of this property and make it free from tolls by either the willing consent of the State of Wisconsin or its agent or by proceeding to condemn it for public purposes. I have no doubt, however, that the State of Wisconsin or its agent, this company, will surrender this canal to the Government and let the Government make it free upon being reimbursed for the expenses over and above the receipts. They have made their statement. Whether it is correct or not I do not know.

Mr. DAWES. Then it seems that the United States propose to pay $150,000 for stepping into the shoes of Wisconsin, and it is paying this tax, which is enough to maintain the canal in repair, and the United States gives Wisconsin $150,000 for that privilege. Wisconsin has no title when it reaches the point of reimbursement. Wisconsin can tax only enough to keep it in repair. Now the United States comes in at that point after the State of Wisconsin is reimbursed for all the cost, and then the United States is to give not exceeding $150,000 for the privilege of maintaining it free of tax or toll. Is not that it?

Mr. MILLER. That is not it. The Senator has not stated the proposition as he did heretofore. The claim of this agent of the State of Wisconsin is that it has not yet reimbursed itself fully for the cost of building its canal. The company through its officers state that they are yet behind $178,000 according to their accounts. They have not yet come up to a point where the United States can step in and limit the tolls, but they are now free to charge any rate of tolls they please.

The commerce of the lakes desires to be rid of any toll whatever, and the committee, going over these accounts as it could, thought in its judgment that the $178,000 perhaps was too much, that some items ought to be stricken out; and it put into the amendment $150,000—not exceeding that—to be paid when the Secretary of War should be satisfied by another examination by a board of engineers that that was a reasonable sum to reimburse this company for its expenditures.

Mr. DAWES. That then, I understand, in the opinion of the committee, is necessary to bring it up to the point where the State could tax only to keep the canal in repair.

Mr. MILLER. That was the opinion of the committee, based on its report; but it was not willing to go to the length of appropriating $150,000 absolutely. It said it should only be paid when the Secretary of War was satisfied on a further examination that that was a reasonable sum.

Now, if the United States Government steps in and reimburses the State of Wisconsin or its agent for the exact sum which it lacks to make up the cost of the canal, it then does not come into possession of the canal. It can simply say to the State of Wisconsin, "You may from this time on charge such tolls as will maintain the canal in repair." The Senator can readily see, and all must see, that this company, acting as the agent of the State of Wisconsin, would from that time on, undoubtedly, in collecting tolls make the expenses of maintenance, that is to say, their own office expenses and the salaries of their own officers, as high as possible; and in order to get rid of this private individual control of this work and to make it free to the whole country it was thought wise that the attempt should be made.

The committee has no knowledge that the State of Wisconsin or that this company which represents it will be willing to accept this money and give up the right to assess reasonable tolls; but it believed that it was well enough to make the attempt to get possession of it if we could. If we should fail, then Congress might hereafter proceed by law to condemn the property or provide that it should be condemned by the courts. That is all there is of it.

Mr. DAWES. Then whether the United States ought to pay $1 or $150,000 depends solely upon the question whether Wisconsin and its agent have actually been reimbursed.

Mr. MILLER. That is all there is of it, and that question is to be settled by the Secretary of War. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin makes that any more definite and absolute I am in favor of it. As I said yesterday, I shall be glad to have any amendment offered which will make the object of the committee more definite and plain.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This amendment was inserted by the Committee on Commerce on the representation of the Senators from Wisconsin as to the importance and necessity of this great public improvement, representing the interests of the people of the State of Wisconsin, not representing any company or any private interests. Now, the Senators from Wisconsin understand what are the best interests of the community as they are affected by this improvement. The Senator from Wisconsin who has offered the amendment this morning is certainly familiar with all that is necessary to accomplish the purpose desired by the committee. I think myself that his amendment does not substantially change the amendment reported by the committee, but it accomplishes the same purpose and is more definite, perhaps, in its provisions. The Secretary of War and the agents of the Government must determine still upon this matter, and this private company must get out of the way if there is a dollar expended under this appropriation. I am entirely willing, therefore, to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. It accomplishes the same purpose with the same securities that we have provided in the amendment to the bill, and is perhaps more definite in the details.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let it be read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert:

For making free of toll to commerce the Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan ship-canal connecting the waters of Green Bay with Lake Michigan in the State of Wisconsin, $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have caused an examination to be made by a board of three United States engineers into the importance and value to commerce and navigation of the free use of said ship-canal, and until the report of said board shall be in favor of making said-canal free to commerce. And provided further, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied, upon investigation, as to the actual cost of said canal to said company, and then only so much of said sum shall be expended as the said Secretary of War shall be satisfied is necessary to reimburse the said company for advances and expenses actually made and incurred in constructing said canal and in maintaining the same over and above the net proceeds of the lands granted by Congress to aid in constructing said canal and over and above the tolls received therefrom, with interest, as provided by the act of Congress making said grant, approved April 10, 1866. And none of said moneys shall be expended except upon a full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said ship-canal, harbor, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every name and nature pertaining to said work.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I am informed that he would vote against this amendment, and I therefore vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 16; as follows:

Of which a sum not exceeding $500 may be used in placing buoys in the channels and elsewhere where needed in the harbor.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Duluth, Minn.: Continuing improvement, and enlarging basin between Minnesota and Rice's Point, $75,000; of which a sum not exceeding $500 may be used in placing buoys in the channels and elsewhere where needed in the harbor; and the consent of the United States is hereby given to a change of the existing dock-line on the east side of Rice's Point by the municipal authorities of Duluth: Provided, That such change meets the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after the words "Secretary of War," at the end of the clause making an appropriation for improving harbor at Duluth, Minn., in line 435, to insert:

And the village of Duluth is hereby granted the right to construct and maintain a sewer for drainage purposes through the United States crib-work bordering on the Duluth Canal, into said canal, subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That such conditions shall be accepted by the village of Duluth before the work herein authorized shall be commenced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that legislation, Mr. President, in a general appropriation bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not see how the legislation is connected with the previous clause.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A point of order is made on the amendment. The Chair will ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the provision in regard to the construction of a sewer is connected in any way with the preceding appropriation and intends to limit it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not see in what respect it limits, controls, regulates, or relates to the appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This legislation was inserted upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War on the application of citizens of Duluth to the War Department. This canal is constructed from the harbor of Duluth through Minnesota Point to Lake Superior, and it is a part of the entire improvement for which this appropriation is made. The permission of the Government to the authorities of Duluth to use the canal for the purpose of draining there would affect, of course, the harbor for which the appropriation is made, and it would require the assent of the Government in order to permit the authorities to do it. While it is incidentally of great sanitary importance to Duluth, we think, so far as we can appreciate the relation of it, it would be proper in this bill as affecting the improvement for which the appropriation is made. It is legislative in its character, but it affects the public improvement for which the appropriation is made, and it is one of great public importance. It is a permit merely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly tends to fill up the canal with sewage.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And therefore the assent of the Government is necessary. The War Department has examined that matter, and it has given its assent through the Secretary of War. The only object is to construct a sewer which shall enter one side of this canal. Of course the provision is legislative in its character, but I think it is connected with the improvement for which the appropriation is made, and upon that ground it might be sustained. There is no appropriation in regard to this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a perpetual grant of an affirmative right to fill up the canal, which we are digging and keeping open, with the sewage of Duluth, and in Washington we are spending vast sums of money to try to get rid of the sewage which is filling up the river.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The canal goes from Superior Bay into Lake Superior. It is a very short canal, through which vessels enter the harbor, and there is no danger whatever of the obstruction of the canal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do they not carry the sewer outside into the lake if the canal is very short?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The city is located above and on Minnesota Point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion, if the point of order is made——

Mr. MCMILLAN. In connection with the remarks I have made I beg leave to read a communication from the Secretary of War addressed to the member of Congress from that district and communicated to us by the Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 27, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your note of the 1st instant, of the letter of the 24th ultimo from Mr. Charles E. Budden, recorder of Duluth, Minn., relative to the passage of an act granting the village of Duluth permission to carry a sewer through the United States crib-work bordering on the Duluth Canal.

In reply I beg to advise you that this matter has heretofore received the attention of the Department upon an application of the authorities of Duluth for the privilege which is now sought to be secured by legislation. After consideration the Secretary of War decided, on August 19, 1885, that he did not consider himself authorized to grant a perpetual privilege of this character without the sanction of Congress, especially in view of the act approved December 20, 1884 (copy inclosed), "granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island."

It would seem that the object of your correspondent will be attained by the passage of an act similar in its conditions to the one above indicated, there being no objection to it by this Department, provided the sewer is constructed under the "separate-system" plan and the village authorities give bond for the proper maintenance of the pier work, &c.

That is signed by the acting Secretary of War.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read the man's name who signed it. I want it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will read the rest of it.

The letter of Mr. Budden is herewith returned, as requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance, and Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
House of Representatives.

The inclosure was the act of Congress granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island, and which is in this language:

CHAP. 4.—An act granting the right of way to the city of Newport, R. I., over the breakwater at Goat Island.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the city of Newport, R. I., is hereby granted the right to construct and maintain a sewer for drainage purposes through or across the breakwater at Goat Island, subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That such conditions shall be accepted by the city of Newport before the work herein authorized shall be commenced.

Approved December 20, 1884.

The language of this amendment is precisely the language of that act of Congress. We thought if Congress could grant a privilege of that kind to Newport, R. I., there would perhaps be no objection to granting the same privilege to Duluth, Minn., particularly where the public interests are greatly advanced and there is no danger whatever that the improvement here will be injured in any way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not let my friend leave me in a wrong position. The difference between Goat Island, Newport, and turning the sewage of this large city into this canal, is that where the Rhode Island people are authorized to carry their sewer through the breakwater they carry it into the open sweeping tides of the sea where it is carried away; but here in a lake as large as this is—large as it is in the mind of my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] it is still destitute of tides, which is the only thing it lacks—the sewage of this city turned into this canal, a narrow slip through which vessels go, is going to entail on somebody a continual expense to dredge it out.

Now, if the United States—I do not know but that it is right—ought to undertake the business of getting rid of the sewage of Duluth out of the Treasury, let them turn it into the canal, and then dredge it out and carry it off, all right; but I should like to consider it a little more and on a bill by itself. It has nothing to do with this appropriation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no danger whatever of any such expense being entailed on the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Because of the situation there. The canal is substantially introducing this drainage into the lake. It is so near the lake that it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then they can carry it to the lake if the distance is so short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that this is general legislation in no way connected with the bill. So the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let it go out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 450, to strike out the following clause:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to cause suit to be instituted for the condemnation of the 12 acres of land said to be necessary to said improvement, and to report the result of such legal proceedings to the next succeeding session of Congress for its action thereon.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the 12 acres of land necessary to said improvement shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and such conveyance has been approved by the Secretary of War.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor and bay at Humboldt, Cal.: Continuing improvement, $100,000: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the 12 acres of land necessary to said improvement shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and such conveyance has been approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The conveyance ought not only to provide in respect of the suitableness of the land, but there ought to be, as in all other cases of the United States getting property, a certificate by the Attorney-General that the title is good. If we go to expending large sums of money there—I see the beginning is $100,000—we ought to be pretty sure that the title to the 12 acres is good; and I suggest, with great deference to the committee, that the clause be amended by inserting after the words "Secretary of War," at the end of line 460:

After the Attorney-General of the United States shall have certified to the Secretary of War that the title is perfect.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 460 to add to the proviso—

After the Attorney-General of the United States shall have certified to the Secretary of War that the title is perfect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then strike out the period after "War," and put this at the end of the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the committee will not insist on that amendment, or if they do that the Senate will not agree to it.

That river rises in my State and runs through it into Florida at Pensacola Bay, and the provision made by the House is $15,000. The amendment might just as well be to strike out the entire appropriation. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the engineer:

The probable increase in the commerce—

On that river—

it is thought may, at the very lowest estimate, be placed at 100 per cent. in a few years.

The annual reduction and saving in hauling freights by river competition exceeded 25 per cent. on merchandise, fertilizers, &c., and over 50 per cent. on cotton, wool, &c., as will be shown by the following:

In 1874, before the river was improved, the cost of hauling and shipping from Geneva or Newton, per railroad, to New Orleans, of one bale of cotton, was $4.50. To-day steamers, barges, &c., connecting of course with the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad, ship cotton through for $1.75 per bale. Wool was hauled and shipped in 1874 at $1 per 100 pounds; to-day it is shipped for 30 cents per 100 pounds.

In 1875 the freight and expense of hauling and shipping of one barrel of flour from New Orleans to Geneva and Newton was $1.30 per barrel; to-day it is 60 cents per barrel. All other freights have been reduced in proportion.

The present plan of improvement was adopted in 1872, and modified in 1880, pursuant to an examination made under the act of March 3, 1879, and contemplates the improvement of the river from its mouth to Newton, a distance of 252 miles, so as to obtain a low-water navigable channel.

The expenditure up to June 30, 1885, has resulted in giving 4½ feet of water in the channel except during low water as far as Jones's old ferry, 27 miles above Geneva, and 2 feet of water in the channel as far as Pates Creek at a medium stage of water.

During high water 5 feet can be carried to this point.

The funds remaining on hand and the appropriation asked for are to be applied to the further improvement of the river in accordance with the approved plan.

The appropriation asked for will barely suffice to pay the running expenses of the snag-boat and maintain one party at rock excavation and other work of improvement.

If a less amount than that asked for be appropriated, the working plant will suffer the consequences of deterioration from disuse.

On those facts I ask the committee not to insist on the amendment, and if they do, I ask the Senate not to agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. I was temporarily out of the Hall, and one or two amendments connected with improvements in the rivers of Georgia were agreed to where I desire to object to the committee amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate on certain amendments.

Mr. BROWN. In reference to the Georgia rivers, I was not in the Chamber at the time the amendments were voted on.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the line the Senator refers to?

Mr. BROWN. Commencing on page 31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWN. On line 740. They were ten pages ahead when I went out of the Chamber, and was gone but a short time to lunch——

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator was absent I will not insist on taking advantage of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Georgia will be recognized to move a reconsideration of the amendments to which he refers.

Mr. BROWN. The first matter to which I refer relates to the improvement of Chattahoochee River. The House having appropriated $20,000, the Senate committee has reduced it to $10,000 by an amendment, I think by a misunderstanding of the facts.

The usual rule, as I understand, in committee is to give a percentage, not a rule that is followed strictly, but in the main—to give a percentage of the estimate made by the engineer. This estimate was made by Lieutenant Hoxie, who states in a report he has since made that he did it looking to the appropriations of last year and reported the smallest amount that would protect the works already done and maintain the improvements, and instead of estimating two or three times as much as is usually appropriated, he only estimated for the actual appropriation needed. The House committees, as I understand, first made the usual percentage, but when they learned the fact as to how he had made his estimates, which were different from those of the other engineers, the committee then consented to change the appropriation and put it at $20,000, the appropriation of last year, I believe.

I should like in this connection to have read the statement of Lieutenant Hoxie as to the basis upon which he made up the estimate. I ask to have it read so as to put the case before the Senate with the correspondence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper sent up by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation of a few moments ago, I beg to state that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, following their usual rule, had cut down the appropriations for the Flint, Chattahoochee, and other rivers; but on reading the statements which I have just put into your hands, that committee put back the appropriations to what they appear in the bill as it was in the bill sent to the Senate. And I may add that when the bill was criticised in the House because it appropriated for these rivers the full amount of the estimates, Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, defended and sustained the bill in this respect by citing these explanations by Captain Hoxie.

Very respectfully,

H. G. TURNER.

Hon. J. E. BROWN, United States Senate.

Mr. BROWN. Now I desire that Captain Hoxie's statement be read, and I ask the attention of the committee to that statement. It is clear that the estimate was made up on a different basis from the usual basis, for some reason, by Captain Hoxie.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, MONTGOMERY, ALA., March 1, 1886.

Hon. H. G. TURNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 27th ultimo is this day received. I quite agree with you that the appropriation asked for Flint River is the least that can be profitably expended annually with the present working plant; and so with the Chattahoochee. If you will examine my annual report (Report of Chief of Engineers, pages 1300 and 1304), you will find the following in connection with the estimate for each river:

"The funds on hand will be exhausted during the present working season. The appropriation asked for is barely sufficient to pay the running expenses of the snag-boat and maintain one working party at excavation on the reefs. If a less amount than that asked for be appropriated, the working plant will suffer the consequences of deterioration from disuse."

I took charge of these rivers, with others, last August, and observed the practice to which you refer of appropriating about one-third the engineer's estimate. Last year no appropriation whatever. I followed closely the debates in Congress upon the last river and harbor bill, and arrived at certain conclusions.

The disposition of Congress is to carry out at the same time all existing work of improvement that is worthy of completion. There is not money enough in the Treasury to do this upon an economical scale by the assurance to each work of a large annual appropriation for the purchase and effective use of a large working plant. Under the circumstances the purchase of such working plant is not advisable. The amount which can be profitably expended is then, ordinarily, the usual annual appropriation, to which the working plant has been gradually adapted.

I am not willing to make any other statement of fact with a view to the cutting down prices, but I think the explanation accompanying my estimates should stay the fall of the ax upon them.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. S. HOXIE,
Captain Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. BROWN. Now I ask to insert a little table that he has made here in reference to the different appropriations and have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Memorandum.

Title of appropriations.	Balance on hand February 25, 1886.	Outstanding liabilities to February 28, 1886.	Amount available February 28, 1886.	Estimates for 1886–'87.

Preservation and repair of fortifications, 1886	1,014 09	875 00	139 09	.....

These estimates, as explained in Appendix "P," Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1885, are the least sums that can be expended with advantage in connection with the existing working plant. On the Oconee and Ocmulgee the working plant has been destroyed by old age through insufficient appropriations before the completion of the improvement, and valuable working plant on other rivers may share the same fate.

Mr. BROWN. It is very clear from the statement of Captain Hoxie himself that he made up the estimates from the appropriations of last year, estimating for the smallest amount that could be got along with, instead of for the largest amount that could be profitably expended. The whole amount of his estimate is simply the usual annual appropriation. As I said before, when the House committee learned that fact they raised this item to the usual appropriation; and I suppose if that fact had been before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate they doubtless would have done the same thing.

I only ask for the usual appropriation; and if we lose it at all it will be on account of the mistake of Captain Hoxie in that regard, or because of the fact that he made his estimate on a different basis from the other engineers. Instead of estimating two or three times the amount appropriated, he simply puts in his estimates what is the usual amount appropriated. I will state that the commerce, as shown by the table I have sent up, upon the river for the last year was nearly $7,000,000. Between the junction of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers, above on the stream is city of Columbus, one of our principal manufacturing cities, and the commerce upon the river is very important and really very heavy. Only $10,000 is appropriated by the amendment for this river. I trust the committee will not press the matter and that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The communications submitted by the Senator from Georgia from Captain Hoxie were not before the Committee of Commerce of the Senate when we considered this item.

Mr. BROWN. So I supposed. Representative TURNER has furnished them to me since.

Mr. MILLER. This new estimate of Captain Hoxie called for an appropriation of more than $20,000 for the year.

Mr. BROWN. No; Captain Hoxie simply states the principle on which he made up his estimates. He did not do as the other officers do. He estimates the amount that was appropriated last year, and what he says is the smallest amount that can be gotten along with. Instead of that, they generally estimate fairly and liberally and say, so much can be profitably expended during the year. The old estimates were two or three times as much as he now makes for this year, and the appropriation in former years has been double what he now proposes to give us.

Mr. MILLER. I notice in the regular report that $20,000 is the amount estimated for the year as the amount which can be profitably expended. The committee in some cases have given the whole of it, and in some cases half, and in some cases a quarter.

Mr. BROWN. According to Captain Hoxie he made the estimate, and he put it down in that way, and he explains in the correspondence with Representative TURNER that he followed the appropriation of last year and intended to have the estimates the same, but he estimated for the smallest amount that could be gotten along with.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amount of the estimate as it came to us from the Engineer Department was $20,000, and the provision made by the House was that exact sum. The rule in all other cases has been to allow a certain proportion of the estimated amount, a third or a quarter or a half, and in rare cases, where the improvement would be completed, perhaps a larger proportion.

Mr. BROWN. I think that is right.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In this case, as the estimate here was for $20,000, we thought the appropriation of the whole amount would have to be amended by taking out a portion of it and putting it on the same footing with other items of appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, in line 740, as to the Chattahoochee River.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. Now, the same rule applies to the Flint River, where the House gave the same amount, one of the rivers estimated for and spoken of by Captain Hoxie, and I desire the same ruling there.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope the Senate will not consent to increase these items so much. Every amendment seems to be adopted increasing the amount of the bill, evidently not by the friends of the bill exclusively; and I think if we are to get a river and harbor bill at all we had better preserve the amendments the committee have recommended, because they are founded on the engineers' reports.

Mr. BROWN. The principle is exactly the same as in the other case, and Captain Hoxie in his statement refers to the Flint River, and says he made the estimate for it upon the same basis. The old appropriation has been $20,000 a year, and it is very badly needed there. I trust the Senate will reject the amendment in that case, and I trust the committee will not insist upon it. It is certainly just to increase the appropriation for the Flint River. If that for the Chattahoochee is right the other is right, because the estimate in both cases was made on the same principle, and the same rule ought to be applied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in line 746, to strike out "twenty" before "thousand" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Improving Flint River, Georgia: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. BROWN. I simply proposed to leave it where the House left it. I desire to have the amendment rejected for the reasons already stated, so as to leave the amount where the House left it and as the former appropriations have been annually—$20,000.

Mr. PLATT. The House left it at $20,000, and provided that $5,000 should be "expended between Albany and Montezuma, and $15,000 below Albany." What I want to know is whether we are to vote on the whole amendment or on the amount simply?

Mr. BROWN. Only on the amount at present.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The question is on the amount.

Mr. BROWN. I expect to have the other amendment acted on afterward, but I propose to ask a vote first on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in line 746, striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. On page 32 of the bill is the appropriation in reference to Romely Marsh. There is an inland channel, as is known I suppose to all Senators——

Mr. FRYE. The order of the Senate was that the amendments of the Committee on Commerce should first be acted upon, and the Committee of the Whole is proceeding now under that order. The Senator from Georgia had better withhold his amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I withhold my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the committee amendments will proceed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 774, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "seven;" after the word "thousand" to insert "five hundred;" and after the word "dollars," in line 775, to strike out "no part of which is to be used above Indian Creek;" so as to read:

Improving Conecuh-Escambia River, Florida and Alabama: Continuing improvement, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 795, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Black Warrior River from Tuscaloosa to Daniel's Creek, Alabama, $50,000, together with the $17,000 on hand; to be expended in accordance with the plan adopted by the board of engineers.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senate not to agree to that amendment, and I do so upon facts that I consider conclusive. I have the engineer's report, in which he states:

The sum of $198,764 can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, which it is thought will complete the improvement.

The object of this improvement is especially for the transportation, in barges, of coal from the coal fields. The enormous quantities of coal in the country through which this river flows, and its superiority and accessibility, prove conclusively the importance of the early completion of this improvement, rendering it available for the use of the General Government, the people of the Gulf States, and the steamers of all nations employed in the commerce of the Gulf.

Now I read from the report lately made by the board of engineers:

The great importance of this improvement, which is intended to place the immense coal fields of the Black Warrior district in direct water communication with the Gulf of Mexico through the harbor of Mobile, has been fully set forth by Major Damrell, the engineer in charge, in his reports of the survey of this river. The board conferred with several of the distinguished citizens of the locality, among whom were Hon. W. C. Jemison, mayor, General S. A. M. Wood, and others, and it fully concurs in the views expressed by Major Damrell as to the great need of this work.

In conclusion, the board desires to recommend that this improvement be commenced and completed with as little delay as possible, so that the advantages to be gained from it may be realized at an early day.

That is signed by five engineers, who made that survey in person; and upon those facts I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. It will be observed by the report of the engineer that there is already unexpended of former appropriations the sum of $47,000. That of course must be added to the appropriation for the present year; and that with the $50,000 makes the appropriation for the year $97,000. The amount estimated by the engineers that can be profitably expended during the year is $198,700. The appropriation here then would be 50 per cent. of the entire amount. That we thought was ample for the improvement this year. Of course that estimate could be expended this year, probably; but the question is, what would be necessary for the proper carrying on of this work; and the committee were of the opinion that with this appropriation the work might be forwarded profitably and successfully, and all be accomplished that was desired during the year.

The object of the improvement seems to be especially for the transportation of coal from the coal fields there, as stated by the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out, in section 1, lines 847 and 848, as follows:

Improving Big Black River, Mississippi: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that the Committee on Commerce recommend this amendment to the Senate upon the ground that some bridges have been built across the stream which impede navigation, and that was the sole ground of the opposition on the part of the committee to this appropriation. I admit that there are three bridges across the stream now which do impede navigation; but I propose by an amendment which I shall offer to correct any unfavorable opinion with reference to this particular clause, and I will read it to the Senate and explain it.

I propose, if this appropriation in the bill as it passed the House is allowed to stand and the recommendation of our committee be disagreed to by the Senate, to add the following proviso to the clause, so as to remove the objection which I understand exists in the mind of the committee to the appropriation as it came from the House:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the State of Mississippi shall have first caused the bridges over said stream south of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad to be constructed so as not to obstruct the navigation of said stream.

The stream has been used for navigation purposes for half a century.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator to make his proviso general, so that the appropriation shall not be used until all the bridges across the stream shall have been made with a sufficient draw for the passage of vessels.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan to be that my amendment does not apply to all the bridges. The Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad bridge is a very high bridge. I am personally cognizant of that fact, and it would rarely, if ever, interfere with the navigation of the stream. Besides, I desire to call the attention of the Senate particularly to the fact that there are 90 miles of navigation south of this bridge, and this appropriation is a very insignificant sum to improve that part of the river; and in view of that fact I think the Senator from Michigan and the Senate might agree to allow this high bridge of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad to remain until the necessities of navigation shall make it necessary to remove it.

Besides, under this bill and under the general law, if this bridge shall prove an obstruction to navigation, the Secretary of War is authorized to have it removed or so constructed as not to interfere with navigation.

I hope the Senate, therefore, with the understanding that immediately upon the disagreement to this amendment I will offer the proviso——

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator read his amendment again?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has a right to offer it now to amend the paragraph proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well, then. At the end of line 848 I move to add:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the State of Mississippi shall have first caused the bridges over said stream south of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad to be so constructed as not to obstruct the navigation of said stream.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is that line of demarkation drawn?

Mr. GEORGE. Ninety miles of the best part of the river are south of that, and that is a very high bridge already, and will not interfere with navigation except in very high water.

The appropriation made by this bill is wholly insufficient according to the engineer's estimate to improve that part of the river below it. In addition to all that, if, when it is improved, this bridge shall be an obstruction to navigation, it is in the power of the Secretary of War to have it removed or draws constructed.

Mr. McMILLAN. The action of the committee in striking out this provision was based on the report of the engineer having the improvement in charge, and his statement clearly includes all these bridges. I will read an extract from the report of the engineer contained in the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1885, part 1, page 241, under the title of "Big Black River, Mississippi:"

The bridge of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad, about 15 miles above the mouth of the river, and that of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad, 90 miles above the mouth, and two highway bridges, all without draws, form obstructions to free and safe navigation at all stages of water. Until these obstructions are remedied it is recommended that no additional funds be appropriated for improving this river.

He embraces all these bridges in his report and all stages of water, and absolutely refrains from recommending an appropriation. If the amendment is to apply to any bridge it should apply to all the bridges, it seems to me, and I do not see that there is any use in making the appropriation. I do not suppose the engineer would use the money even if it were appropriated.

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that is that the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad bridge is 90 miles from the mouth of the Big Black. The money heretofore has all been expended below that, and then, as I have stated, it is a very high bridge and will only in very rare instances interfere with navigation.

Mr. McMILLAN. The first extract I read was from the Chief of Engineers' report transmitting the local engineer's report. Now, the local engineer states in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, part 2, page 1524:

The bridges of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad, about 15 miles above the mouth, and the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad, 90 miles above the mouth, neither having draws, form obstructions to free and safe navigation at all stages of water. Two highway bridges, respectively 25 and 78 miles above the mouth, also form barriers to navigation, neither being provided with draws.

There are four bridges within that space of 90 miles, and the engineer embraces them all; I do not know how there could be any exception made, and I think we could do nothing else than strike out this clause.

Mr. FRYE. Does he not say there ought not to be any improvement made?

Mr. McMILLAN. He says that expressly. I read that in my first statement.

Mr. GEORGE. I have nothing more to say except what I have said, that this money will not reach the improvement of the river as high as the Meridian Railroad bridge; and whenever that becomes a serious obstruction to the navigation of the river it will be time enough to remove it. The other bridges are all below and are all low bridges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the clause.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think that would imply a power which we could not properly exercise, directing the State of Mississippi to remove these obstructions. I do not know that the State of Mississippi has any control over these railroad companies. The navigable streams are under the custody and direction of the United States, and we should remove these obstructions ourselves. I do not know that it would be proper to direct the State of Mississippi to do it.

Mr. INGALLS. I have examined the report of the committee and find that there are no statistics in regard to Big Black River in Mississippi.

Mr. McMILLAN. Because the item was stricken out and the report of the engineers contains the cost.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to ask the Senator from that State whether he could advise the Senate as to the width of this stream and the depth of water maintained at the present time for navigation.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I could except to say this, that it has been used for navigation purposes——

Mr. INGALLS. For steamers of considerable draught?

Mr. GEORGE. No, small steamers, for half a century. There are no shoals in the river. The only trouble about the navigation of the river is the overhanging timber and the serpentine course of the river itself. It is a stream that has been navigated for 200 miles, running through the very best part of the State of Mississippi, highly cultivated and populous counties lying on each side of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. INGALLS. The report of the Chief of Engineers contains no statistics of the commerce of those communities that are located along the banks of the Big Black River. I am very much disposed to endeavor to obtain in some way a rude equity about this bill by assisting those States that have no Senator upon the Committee on Commerce to obtain the amounts to which they would be entitled under a fair distribution of the amounts that are appropriated by this bill. It is said that Heaven takes care of those who take care of themselves, and the Committee on Commerce have very well taken care of themselves, but in those States that have been so unfortunate as not to be represented upon the Committee on Commerce, which have been made the victims of a transcendental economy, I desire, if possible, to correct those matters of law by the application of principles of equity in those cases. But I confess that the appropriation made for Big Black River rather staggers me, for I find on page 1524 of the report of the Chief of Engineers that the appropriation made in 1885 was expended in cutting 20,987 trees, in girdling 3,744 trees, in removing 1,791 snags, 2,063 logs, and 48 rock heaps from the channel, and cutting 695 stumps.

Mr. TELLER. Were the stumps in the river?

Mr. INGALLS. It does not say whether the stumps were in the river or on the banks. It states also that—

A large jam of logs and brush, which had formed at the piers of the old Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad bridge, completely obstructing the channel, was removed in March, 1885.

This work has resulted in the removal of the principal obstructions from the banks and channel, and greatly increased the facilities for navigation on that portion of the river in which it was done.

The elimination of the trees from this river and the girdling of those that threatened its channel and the cutting of the stumps that the citizens had apparently left in objectionable places along these shores, I should judge from this report, had been sufficiently performed for the current year, and unless there has been an exceedingly rapid growth of vegetation in that country the last year I do not very well see how $5,000 additional could be required for this purpose. With every disposition to be liberal toward those States that have no member upon the Committee on Commerce, I fear that in the absence of more definite information than appears in the report of the Chief of Engineers I shall be compelled to disagree with the Senator from Mississippi. I reserve, however, the right to change my opinion in case further inquiry shall show the propriety of this appropriation.

Mr. GEORGE. The estimate of the Chief of Engineers for the completion of the improvements of the river already begun is $27,000.

I do not know what is intended to be done, but that is the amount said to be necessary. I have not made an inspection of the stream for the purpose of stating to the Senate what the particular works are; but here is the estimate, on page 1525, to which I call attention of the Senator from Kansas, of $27,000 as needed for the completion of the existing project.

I will read also, since the matter has taken up so much of the time of the Senate, what the local engineer says about it. First I will read the commercial statistics which the Senator from Kansas wants to hear, all I have on that subject. On page 1527 the engineer says:

No reliable commercial statistics could be obtained, but the valley of the river is very fertile, and it is estimated that about 4,000 bales of cotton and 40,000 sacks of seed are annually produced in an ordinary season along that portion of the stream on which work was done during the past season.

That is the first 74 miles.

About 100,000 oak staves are shipped out by the river every year by means of flatboats.

On page 1526, the local engineer says:

The valley of Big Black is very fertile and productive; except where the Walnut Hills intercept the valley, cultivation is continuous on either side. The slopes incline rapidly to the river, rendering cultivation of lands immediately along the banks impracticable, but the edge of the cultivated lands on either side is not more than one-fourth of a mile from the river bank; 4,000 bales of cotton and 40,000 sacks of seed are produced in an ordinary season from its mouth to the Ivanhoe bridge.

And along that, below the Vicksburg and Meridan bridge:

Most of this cotton and cotton-seed is either hauled a great distance to Port Gibson or Vicksburg at a considerable expense, or disposed of near home at a sacrifice.

I will go on a little further, and state that in July, 1882, when the river and harbor bill was up, I offered an amendment to the bill appropriating $10,000 for the improvement of this river. It was debated in the Senate. My then colleague, Mr. Lamar, made this statement, which I desire to read in the hearing of the Senate:

I concur with the Senator from Ohio that there ought to be a limit to the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Applying his rule, what discrimination ought to be made? I think he has not very judiciously timed his suggestion in applying it to the amendment offered by my colleague.

That was the amendment of $10,000 for the Big Black.

This river is a navigable river, and it runs through a very important part of the country. The commodity which it bears to market and the centers of trade constitute largely the basis of our foreign commerce. It is no insignificant stream, but a large river, and I regret very much that the Senator's zeal for economy comes in just at this point.

A yea-and-nay vote on the amendment was had, and thirty-two Senators voted in favor of the amendment, and twenty-one against it, giving $10,000 to this river. It seems to me that after that it is not necessary for me to say anything further in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment as amended be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The clause proposed to be stricken out as now amended reads:

Improving Big Black River, Mississippi: Continuing improvement, $5,000. Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used until the State of Mississippi shall have first caused the bridges over said stream south of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad to be so constructed as not to obstruct the navigation of said stream.

Mr. INGALLS. This river, so far as I can ascertain, from its headwaters to its junction with the Mississippi, is about 400 miles in length.

The first appropriation for improving this stream was made by river and harbor act of July 5, 1884. The project for the improvement contemplates the removal of snags, logs, wrecks, and overhanging trees obstructing navigation between the mouth and Cox's ferry, 130 miles above, at an estimated cost of $32,000.

The engineer states that the improvement, when the entire amount has been expended, will not be permanent, as new obstructions are continually added from time to time. After reciting the work in detail that was done by the engineer, he continues, on page 241 of the first part of volume 2, Executive Document No. 1, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, to state:

The river, however, is only navigated at present by flatboats carrying staves, &c.

"Staves" I suppose mean the lumber of which barrels are made. I can not understand how a bridge, if it is constructed as bridges ordinarily are at a reasonable distance above flood-level, could be any obstruction whatever to the navigation of a stream by flatboats carrying staves. It may be that the country being in the nature of a morass or swamp and subject to continual overflow, these bridges may not be sufficiently above the flood-level to afford room for flatboats to get under, so that I do not see how the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi either helps or hinders this proposition, inasmuch as the snags and logs and rocks and overhanging trees have all been removed, and it does not appear that they have been again renewed so as to make obstacles to navigation. I should think that the committee ought to be supported.

Mr. GEORGE. As these bridges are now constructed steamboats can not pass under. Steamboats formerly navigated the river, but of course they can not as long as the three bridges below remain unremoved. My proposition is to remove them or have draws made in them or allow the State to do it before any money is spent. Then these steamboats can go there as they did in former times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. By the action of the Senate the amendment of the committee is disagreed to and the clause stands with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Can we not have the yeas and nays?

Several SENATORS. Too late.

Mr. PLATT. That adds $5,000 to the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all; a mere trifle!

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 861, to increase the appropriation for "improving Bayou Terre Bonne, Louisiana: Continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $10,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is Bayou Terre Bonne? I should like to hear that explained.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Louisiana will explain that amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. He is a member of the committee, I believe.

Mr. GIBSON. I will explain the amendment.

Gentlemen who are familiar with the Mississippi River know that it flows almost due south until it reaches Red River, and below that it flows generally in a southeasterly direction, so that if at any point on the Mississippi River after it reaches Red River you can take a bayou which connects with waters flowing southwesterly to the Gulf of Mexico it will be the shorter line to the Gulf, much shorter than the line taken by the river itself. This improvement of the Bayou Terre Bonne is intended to give a short line from the Mississippi River to Texas, a shorter and an inland line in effect from the valley of the Mississippi to Texas and Mexico. It will save about 150 miles. Instead of taking the circuit down the Mississippi River all the way to its mouth and then around the Gulf to Texas, the completion of this improvement, I repeat, will give a short inland line of communication by water from the Mississippi River through the various bayous, Bayou La Fourche, Bayou Terre Bonne to Berwick Bay, Berwick Bay being on the direct line to the State of Texas.

I have a report written in 1884 by the engineer in charge of that district, an extract from which I will read explaining this appropriation:

This route—

Says Major Stickney——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under what date?

Mr. GIBSON. January 24, 1884.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Two years and a half ago.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that unless he has looked at the map of the State of Louisiana or has done me the honor to pay attention to my observations he will not appreciate the remarks here.

This route, while making a very direct communication between New Orleans and Morgan City—for through commerce between the former city and the Teche country, Southwestern Louisiana, and Texas, would be a central line for the local commerce of that portion of the State lying between Donaldsonville, on the Mississippi, and the Gulf of Mexico.

The local benefit of such a direct communication with a market is at once apparent. The general benefit would be in the shortening of the water route between the deep-water harbor of the principal city and market of the State—and all of the tributary territory of the Southwest, increased safety of navigation as compared with the dangers of the Gulf and the possibilities arising in time of war, the checking of exorbitant freight rates on railroads, and the probable development of the resources of this portion of the State.

That, in a word, Mr. President, is the theory on which this improvement (which appears to any one not acquainted with the country a mere local benefit) becomes an important work, giving it the impress of a national character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far from the railway is this line of water?

Mr. GIBSON. It runs along some distance almost parallel with the railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far distant from the nearest point on this bayou to the railway line?

Mr. GIBSON. About 12 miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a railroad from New Orleans to Morgan City?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir. This is a shorter line than the railroad, and it would give an opportunity to carry commodities from the Mississippi Valley by this inland water route to Berwick Bay, which will be the shipping point for the Gulf of Mexico. If the whole country through which this bayou runs and the other bayous which empty into it were a wilderness, this improvement would be important in respect of the national commerce of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can perfectly understand and sympathize with the idea that the digging out of this river or bayou would be a local benefit, if for no other reason than for assisting in the drainage of the lands which lie along its sides. I believe, if I am correctly informed, that the lands in that neighborhood are low. I believe that the planters have extensive ditches all along that bayou, as it is called, draining their plantations as far as the nature of the ground will allow.

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator will permit me I can explain that. About half the lands on either side of this bayou are drained into the bayou. The other half are drained into the swamps lying in the rear. But the police jury (which is our local government) in that parish has passed an ordinance prohibiting planters from draining into the bayou, and the bayou is a navigable stream on which boats have been running for years—forty years to my own knowledge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see how any police jury, while they may prohibit the digging of a ditch which will give celerity to the flow of water down-hill, can prohibit the water that drains from these plantations plowed up for corn, sugar-cane, and so on from running into this bayou. And therefore, in respect of the matter of drainage, the more the bayous are improved, and the more free the circulation of water in them, the better would be the drainage of the lands.

I wish to say again that I sympathize deeply with the idea of how much of local benefit is obtained by this species of appropriation. I can readily understand, from my knowledge of the somewhat mountainous and precipitous State in which I live, that if Congress would devote something of its superabundant means, which it is stated we have—I am not sure of it myself—to the building of highways in the State of Vermont that make the transfer by either a railway-highway or a roadway, of the commerce of New Hampshire and Maine to the borders of Lake Champlain, and from the vast region of Northern New York to the ocean, it would be not only a great local benefit to the farmers who live along it, but it would be of national importance. But we have not yet in New England got up to the idea that it was a part of a national object to operate in a way that chiefly redounds to local benefit, that those great national interests, like the harbor of New Orleans, like the mouth of the Mississippi River, like New York, like Savannah, and like San Francisco, and so on, which are one thing, are to have carried along on their backs these appropriations for improving every place in the United States where water runs or stands still. While it is true that if you do spend your money you help somebody, you employ the laboring man, you keep money in circulation, you benefit the farmer and trader who live near to it, and your duty in that respect is just as great where there does not happen to be any water as it is where there is.

The Constitution of the United States makes no distinction between land and water except in its judicial clauses concerning maritime jurisprudence and piracy on the high seas. So that, as it respects our domestic affairs, our solidarity as a nation of people who come from all, State and State and within States, just as if we were one single homogeneous State, there is no distinction between furnishing facilities and local and general benefits by improving rivers and by building roads, canals, &c., and our fathers knew it. They provided in the first instance, before railways, as we know, for the Cumberland road, which was a great national work, and so on. When you come to apply the real idea of our spending proper money out of the national Treasury for great national objects that are really a benefit to the whole country like the great places that I have named, and not to particular segregated and local parts of it, then I give most heartily and liberally; but when, as I said before, you are to make that the omnibus, on the four wheels of which all our small local interests and benefits are to be loaded and be carried through, I confess I do not think it just or constitutional or politic.

Now, to come back to this particular instance, let us see whether it is within or without the rule. I speak with the greatest sympathy and respect about the Bayou Terre Bonne. Here is the last report of the engineer in charge, sent in at the beginning of the session. It is stated that "no work has been done on it for two years," owing to a lack of funds.

An examination of this stream was ordered by Congress in 1879.

That is always the first step.

A project for improvement was made in 1880—

It seems to take a year to make a project—

at an estimated cost of $18,800, of which about $15,000 was to be for dredging, the balance for removing logs, clearing of trees, &c.

The commerce to be benefited by the improvement, principally sugar and molasses, was estimated at an annual valuation of $958,750. In 1880 an appropriation of $10,000 was made. With this a dredge was hired—

It does not say how much of the $10,000 it took to hire the dredge, but I hope it did not take it all, as it did all the bonds on the other great national work, that we provided to pay, for the expenses of printing and negotiating.

With this a dredge was hired, and work was commenced 23½ miles below Houma, La., working up-stream. In March, 1881, $8,800 more was appropriated.

The hired dredge improved about 8½ miles of channel, and in 1881 stopped work about 15 miles below Houma.

They had got eight miles and a half.

The examination for improving the bayou was made during high water, and was found to be altogether too small in amount, as during low water it was seen that the bayou was little more than a ditch. The estimate for improvement was accordingly increased by Major Howell, the officer then in charge, by $20,000.

Which would redeem this bayou—I am not now reading, but stating—from the somewhat degraded character of being a ditch, as was supposed, into the dignity of being a genuine bayou entitled to national consideration. Now I go on to read:

With part of the money available from money appropriated for this work and part from Bayou Black appropriation a dredge was built.

They found the expense of hiring evidently too much, and so they took another way that time, and bought a dredge.

The Terre Bonne appropriation paid $5,262.70 toward the building of the dredge.

That was out of the $8,800 more, the first $8,000 having run out apparently. They took $5,262.70 to build a dredge, which left them about $1,700 to carry on the work.

In August, 1882, $7,000 more was appropriated for continuing this work, and in September, 1882, work with the new dredge was commenced.

They built the dredge in 1881 apparently, and that took about all the money; and then in September, 1882, having got $7,000, more they began; and that I say is not the fault of the bayou, it is the fault of the proper thing to be done with too small an appropriation.

In August, 1882, $7,000 more was appropriated for continuing this work, and in September, 1882, work with the new dredge was commenced and continued to within 10½ miles of Houma—

Taking it out from the $15,000, which long before would have completed about four miles and a half more of the improvement—when the funds became nearly exhausted, and further work had to stop.

No appropriations have since been made, and consequently no further work has been done. The channel was originally dredged to a depth of 6 feet—

Not giving the width of the channel—

but nearly every plantation on the bayou—

This is a report sent in in December, bear in mind, made the summer before:

But nearly every plantation on the bayou has ditches draining into it. These cause deposits in the bayou.

The state of nature is somewhat different in Louisiana to what it is in Minnesota at Duluth, where the drainage of the sewage of a large city into a canal has no tendency to fill it up, as we are told, but in Louisiana the forces of nature operate differently, and the draining of the ditches into the bayou tends to fill it up—and opposite these numerous ditches it has again shoaled up until the depth is only about 4.8 feet.

Whether that is at high water or low water we are not informed.

One or two very small steamboats run up to Houma when there is any business for them, and the project was to carry the improvement up to Houma, there connect with an old abandoned canal—

Whether it goes by the name of Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan I do not know.

about a mile long—

You see there is a great similarity in the distances, but I do not know that it tends to prove identity. The Sturgeon Bay, I believe, is a mile and an eighth, so it probably is not the same canal—

now dry, with wagon-roads crossing each end of it, which canal formerly connected with the Bayou Black. Should this and the Bayou Black work ever reach the opposite ends of this short canal, which was about 33 feet wide, then it was hoped this would be deepened and enable the tides to flow regularly through both bayous and the canal, and maintain by its flow a better depth of water by preventing the rapid growth and accumulation of grass and vegetable matter.

As a local and nice little thing for the planters along there, I am for it; but as a great national object, I must say that I can not see my way clear to vote for increasing this appropriation.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I concur entirely in the general observations which the Senator from Vermont has made. I concur with him entirely in his constitutional view with reference to the works of improvement under this bill; but the difficulty about his position is that he antagonizes geography and facts in this case, and in that respect I can not concur with him.

The people living upon this bayou do not drain their plantations into it. It is not necessary that they should drain their plantations into the bayou at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the engineer says they do, this very year.

Mr. GIBSON. The engineer reported that they did, but I have stated that an ordinance had been passed by the local government preventing them from draining into the bayou, because it is not necessary for the drainage of their plantations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He speaks in the present tense here, this very summer.

Mr. GIBSON. I am speaking from a thorough knowledge of that bayou and of the people who live upon it. They drain their plantations for the most part to the swamps which stretch away from the highlands on the bayou into the Gulf of Mexico, into which the bayou itself empties; and the drainage is much better on the rear of their plantations and their homes than in the direction of the bayou itself.

It is related by some magician that when a man from a cold climate presented himself before the King of Siam, or some potentate in a southern country, and stated that water became hard in the country where he was from——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may correct the Senator, that is in Scott's story of the Talisman——

Mr. GIBSON. It is related also, if the Senator will permit me, that the monarch held he would rather believe that the person who had related this story was guilty of an untruth or of a mistake than that the laws of nature, so far as he knew them, were suspended. I will inform the Senator that an inhabitant of Terre Bonne Parish, in which this bayou is situated, might go to Vermont in midwinter and find the streams all frozen up hard and unnavigable, and come back and report to the people of Louisiana that we were endeavoring here to improve the water courses in a country where the water was all congealed and there was no navigation for four or five months in the year, and that we were expending the public money improperly.

I will state to the Senator that in this alluvial district the streams become very shoal and shallow in summer; they often fill with grass; they become a foot or 18 inches deep; but in the winter, at the time the crops are being moved on the bayous throughout Mississippi and Louisiana, they are large and navigable streams; they would be considered navigable streams in Vermont, very large rivers for a State like Vermont or any other State in the Union. We must therefore take into consideration these physical characteristics of the country in making appropriations for the bayous.

I said at the outset that while this in one aspect was a local improvement (and every improvement must necessarily be in one aspect a local improvement; you must give it a local habitation and a place), the purpose is to give connection between New Orleans and Berwick Bay by a line 100 miles shorter than going around by the mouth of the Mississippi River, in which the commodities from the Mississippi Valley might be distributed not only to Texas but throughout the country bordering upon the Gulf of Mexico.

It seems to me that we should improve a bayou which during eight or nine months of the year is 6 or 8 feet deep, navigable for large boats, for batteaux of all kinds, which will give us such a connection. It is not necessary either to go through with this canal of which the engineer speaks. There is a bayou just above the canal which is a navigable highway and which communicates with Berwick Bay.

So when you come to look at the facts in the case, the intention of the appropriation is not to confer a benefit upon a community by improving a local stream, but to use a local stream in order to give connection between the city of New Orleans and Berwick Bay; and in that sense I submit to the Senate that it is lifted out of the character of a mere local improvement, and that there is impressed upon it a national importance and character.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think the questions that are raised upon this amendment are very important ones. If the Senator from Vermont is right, then there is a very small portion, if any, of this bill which ought to be passed by the Senate or by either House of Congress.

What is a national work? That is a very difficult question to determine. How many people shall it benefit? Shall it benefit all the people of the United States or a majority of the people of the United States to constitute it national? Is it to be determined in respect to the number of citizens of the United States whom it shall benefit? If it be a majority, the port of New York is probably the only one in the whole range of river and harbor improvement that is a constitutional and proper object of expenditure.

But I do not think that you can determine the propriety of an appropriation in respect strictly and alone to the number of people whom it shall directly benefit. Suppose we take a single bale of cotton or a single bushel of wheat that enters into the foreign commerce of this country or into its domestic commerce and becomes a subject of exchange, which is more particularly illustrated in reference to its foreign commerce. It goes to any of the great ports of shipment. It becomes converted into a value which, transported abroad, becomes exchange, and enters into the general commerce of this country. In that respect that bushel of wheat or that bale of cotton is of national interest and of national importance. It becomes a part of the great industries and the exchanges of the country.

Certainly no improvement would be undertaken for an insignificant quantity. But let us suppose a case where a bayou, a creek, or a river may by an appropriation of a reasonable amount of the public money be converted into a great highway of commerce, either interstate or foreign, by what rule of reason or argument will you say that the large number of people, the whole entirety of the country may not be benefited by the exchanges consequent upon opening this new avenue of commerce?

It occurs to me that you can not test the value of an improvement for the transportation of the productions of the country by any other question than how far it will promote the exchange and interchange of any considerable portion of the productions of the country.

If I conceived that that was not the proper ground for voting a river or harbor improvement I should be limited entirely to the single port of New York. But, as I understand, it is to promote in a material and an important degree the interstate or the foreign commerce of the country; and wherever an improvement will do that, and do it to such an extent as shall appreciably affect the general welfare of the country or the great bulk of its productions, it is a proper object of appropriation. The people of every locality have therefore a reasonable interest in a river or harbor improvement, to be determined only in respect to the cost of such improvement and to its value when made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 871, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Red River, Louisiana and Arkansas: Continuing improvement from Fulton, Ark., to the Atchafalaya River, Louisiana, including completing the work at Alexandria, $95,000; of which sum $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in making a thorough survey of the river from Fulton, Ark., to the Atchafalaya River, and in completing the survey of Bayou Pierre, Louisiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the chairman explain that. Paying $25,000 for making a survey seems to need some explanation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not hear the Senator's remark.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish some explanation as to paying $25,000 out of this appropriation for improving the Red River from Fulton, Ark., to the Atchafalaya River in Louisiana. The total is $95,000, of which $25,000 is for a survey, which is more than a quarter of it as the committee has left it. Of course the committee amendment is an improvement on the bill, but I should like to know on what ground more than a quarter of the total appropriation is to be expended in making a survey of a well-known river, as I suppose this must be.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is upon the recommendation of the engineer in charge of this improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what page is that recommendation to be found?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The report will be found on pages 230 and 252 of the report of the Chief of Engineers, and pages 1617 and 1472 of the detailed reports.

Mr. PLATT. By whom is this survey to be made? By a Government engineer?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the necessity of the survey? Can not the chairman state it to us in brief?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The engineer recommended a survey of the entire river. That embraces the whole of the river, of course; and to do that he says would take the sum of $45,000. We thought that there was no necessity for any survey above Fulton; that practically above Fulton there is no necessity for any survey of the river or any improvement of the river, so far as we can discover; and that certainly $25,000 would be ample, even assuming that there was a necessity, as recommended by the engineer in charge of the improvement.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator from Vermont will permit me to make an observation about this item.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I happen to know something about Red River. It has never been surveyed, and it is a very peculiar stream. There is upon it above Shreveport what is known as the great raft, upon which the Government has expended several hundred thousand dollars, without having successfully removed it to this day. This survey extends from Fulton to the mouth of the Atchafalaya, a distance of three hundred and sixty-odd miles. There never has been a survey of the river there, and on account of the creation of a new outlet and the effect this raft has had upon the river above Shreveport it is absolutely necessary that the survey should be made in order to know where improvements can be effectually placed.

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will state what the engineers specially ask.

It is recommended that a complete survey of Red River be made from Fulton, Ark., to its mouth, and that $45,000 be appropriated for this purpose in addition to the sum required for the improvement of the river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What year was that?

Mr. GIBSON. That is this year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What document is the Senator reading from?

Mr. GIBSON. Report No. 1391, made by the Committee on Commerce to the Senate, which embraces the substance of the report of the engineers and the estimate made by the engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the report of the committee.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir. The amount is cut down by the committee from $45,000 to $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here is the statement of the engineer. There may be some other statement, but I wish to contribute the little I can to help to a proper consideration of the bill. In this last volume, on page 1617 of the report of the Chief of Engineers, it is stated:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., November 12, 1884.

GENERAL: In pursuance with the requirements of your letter of July 31, 1884, I have the honor to furnish the following information relative to the question whether or not the Red River above Fulton is "worthy of improvement."

Mr. VEST. That is a different part of the river, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the report of the engineers about the other part of the river, then, if the river has two parts?

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Louisiana has it, and I have it here also.

Mr. GIBSON. It is the report of the engineers that I have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Louisiana was reading from the report of the committee, I understood.

Mr. VEST. No; the report of the engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On what page?

Mr. GIBSON. Page 237.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask my friend from Minnesota to state again the pages of the report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Pages 1617 and 1472, part 2. At page 1472 you will find Appendix U.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us see how that is:

Improvement of Red River——

Mr. MCMILLAN. "Louisiana and Arkansas."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. The Chair will pardon me a moment. Instead of speaking I will try to find this place.

Mr. PLATT. While the Senator is looking for it I should like to make an inquiry. If I correctly understand the report of the committee, on page 237 the statement is that the amount which can profitably be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is $90,000; but I find as the bill comes over from the House that it provides for the expending of $95,000, which is $5,000 more than the Chief of Engineers, as I suppose, says can be profitably expended.

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator from Connecticut is in error in that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Look at page 231.

Mr. GIBSON. The engineers ask for $90,000 for the improvement of the river, and in addition they ask for $45,000 for a survey. The committee allow $95,000 for the improvement and survey.

Mr. PLATT. No; they allow $95,000 for the improvement of the river.

Mr. GIBSON. "Of which sum $25,000" shall be used for making a survey.

Mr. PLATT. I see; the Senator is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see at page 231 that Captain Bergland, of the Corps of Engineers, after proceeding to state the difficulties of doing anything there, that the great raft or dam made by the timber that has come down and lodged has improved the navigation in a certain place below Shreveport; and when they were trying to cut out this raft, closing Tone's Bayou and opening a channel through the falls of Alexandria, and deepening the water over the shoal places, &c., the thing was so unpopular there among the people who were to have the benefit of the navigation that they rose with an armed force and drove off the persons who were engaged in spending the public money to carry out this supposed improvement.

Mr. INGALLS. And destroyed a dam which had already been erected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, and destroyed a dam, &c. In view of the question whether it is worth while to spend even $25,000 for surveying a river which is now so full of wood and of earth that they can not yet find out in what way they want to improve it, and when in doing what they have already tried to do the people of the vicinity find it so injurious to their interests that they rise contrary to law and resort to methods of violence to prevent this public work being carried on, I think we might well wait a little while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GIBSON. This is an amendment cutting down the appropriation, I suggest to Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 902, after the word "improvement," to strike out "according to the plan and recommendations in Appendix V 13, Executive Document 1, Forty-ninth Congress," and in line 904, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which there are to be expended $8,000 at Pine Bluff, $13,000 at Fort Smith, and $10,000 at Dardanelles, or so much thereof under those sums respectively as may be necessary at those points;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Arkansas River, Arkansas: Continuing improvement, $75,000.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask some member of the committee reporting the bill the object of moving to strike out the lines just read by the Secretary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The object the committee had in view was to avoid adopting the plan of improvement of this river referred to in the bill as it came from the House. We thought we were not ready to enter upon the execution of a plan of such magnitude at this time, and that the appropriation should be made to merely continue the improvement of the river without entering upon the new project. To continue it as it has been we were willing to permit the sum to be appropriated without committing Congress to the plan which is submitted in the executive document referred to here. That is the reason why the committee struck out the clause in the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If the ameudment as proposed by the committee should be adopted by the Senate, I should like to understand if the $75,000 proposed to be appropriated to the Arkansas River would necessarily be used for the removal of snags, wrecks, &c., as provided in the next paragraph.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It would be appropriated in that way under the former plan, not entering upon the plan suggested in the appendix to the report of the Chief of Engineers, which is referred to in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It would be in pursuance of the plan heretofore pursued for the improvement of the river in a general way, do I understand the chairman to say?

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is a separate appropriation.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understand.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The $75,000 is for continuing the improvements as they have progressed heretofore under the direction of the Secretary of War. As the bill came from the House it abandoned the former system of improvement and entered upon a plan suggested by the engineers, departing of course from the original plan; and we thought it better to leave the appropriation and let the engineer go on in pursuance of the views heretofore entertained by the Secretary of War and carried out by those under his direction.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There is one other question I should like to ask. If the amendment should be adopted as it is proposed, could any part of this appropriation of $75,000 be used for the purpose of removing bars at Fort Smith, Pine Bluff, and Dardanelles?

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it was embraced in the improvement of the river heretofore it could be so expended by the engineer in charge of the work. We struck out the limitations upon the Chief of Engineers and upon his subordinates, and we permit him to exercise his discretion in the expenditure of this money and in the improvement of the river as the improvement has been heretofore carried on. That is the only thing.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I have a report here from Captain Taber, made this spring to a member of the committee of the House, stating the necessity for this appropriation and for the removal of these bars. I am perfectly willing to let the amendment be adopted as it is if the engineers in charge of this appropriation can, if it is necessary to do so, use the money for the purpose of removing these obstructions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is in their discretion certainly, if that has been the plan of the improvement of the river heretofore.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If that is the effect of the amendment, I have no objection to its adoption.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It does not require the engineer to do it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 910, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "twenty-five;" after the word "thousand" to strike out "five hundred;" in line 911, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which sum $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used to complete the survey of the Arkansas River between Little Rock, Ark., and Wichita, Kans.;" so as to make the clause read:

For the removal of snags, wrecks, and other obstructions in the Arkansas River, $25,000.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, for the reason that the report of the engineer shows that a survey has been made of the Upper Arkansas River before this time, which has been completed, and of which the data and field-notes are all in the hands of the engineer, and it is absolutely necessary to have $1,500 to make the maps, so as to utilize the work which has been done heretofore by the officers in charge. It seems to me that it would be as absolutely necessary that those maps be made and that the $1,500 asked for by the engineer be appropriated in the bill as it is to appropriate any other amount of money asked for.

I do not understand upon what theory the committee proceeded in reducing the appropriation $1,500 from the amount asked for. I should like to know what particular object the committee had in making that reduction, or else I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be observed that we continue the appropriation for the removal of the snags and other obstructions in the river, and we propose to strike out $1,500 which is supposed to be necessary to complete the survey of the river between Little Rock, Ark., and Wichita, Kans. I suppose that is for the purpose of making a survey of that portion of the river. There was nothing to indicate that it is the mere making of maps or plans or anything of that kind of a survey that has been heretofore made, but it appeared to be for the continuation of the survey, and it was not deemed necessary to make a special appropriation for a survey in regard to that part of the river.

In the bill we make a general appropriation for the surveys of rivers; and additional provisions for special surveys should never be permitted unless for very strong reasons. We merely struck out the portion in regard to the survey, which would indicate some enlargement and new work to be undertaken. Continuing the work as it is going forward, we merely struck out this appropriation for the survey, and reduced the total appropriation by that amount.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In the estimate as made by the Department, on page 252, under the head of "continuation of survey of Arkansas River from Wichita, Kans., to Fort Gibson, Ind. T.," I find the following:

There was expended up to June 30, 1884, upon this $6,545.44, which had carried the survey well down toward Tulsa, in the Indian Territory. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, there was expended $2,575.43, which completed the field work in an indifferent way and plotted the notes so as to make them available.

The maps will answer for the present necessity, but will require more than the available balance on hand to complete them. The officer in charge estimates that $1,500 will be required for this purpose and for completing the maps of the survey of the lower river, for which an appropriation was made in the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884.

It appears from this that a survey which has been heretofore made and which is practically completed will be useless unless this $1,500 shall be appropriated to make the maps to utilize the surveys previously made. Under the circumstances it seems to me the committee have made an oversight in not providing for these maps.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If that were so, then it should be "for the purpose of completing the maps for the survey of the river heretofore made."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As the appropriation is made for that purpose, and as the money is necessary for the survey work, I presume that the language would be sufficient to cover it, and when the engineer says the object is to make maps, I suppose he may be trusted to use the $1,500 for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause in section 1 from line 915 to line 917, inclusive, as follows:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, Texas, and the Indian Territory, above Fulton, Ark., $7,000.

Mr. BERRY. I think the committee, in offering this amendment, was laboring under a misapprehension as to the facts. It has been stated to me by members of the committee that they went upon the supposition that there was no estimate for this work. They were probably misled by the words "Texas and the Indian Territory," which should not be in the clause; they were placed there by mistake in the House. It should read:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, above Fulton, Ark., $7,000.

The estimate will be found on page 1617 of the report of the Chief of Engineers. It will there be seen that there is a recommendation for improving Red River above Fulton, Ark., of $10,000. There was a subsequent report of the engineer, who said that no improvement was necessary above that point; that is, from the mouth of the Kimishi to the mouth of the Washita, but it has no reference whatever to this. That is an improvement in the Indian Territory and Texas, which the engineer did state was not necessary; but this improvement he does recommend, with the exception of the words "Texas and the Indian Territory." The clause should read:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, above Fulton, Ark.

The report will be found, as I stated, on page 1617. I am satisfied that the committee acted upon a misapprehension of the facts. Therefore I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. VEST. I wish to remove from the minds of the Senators from Arkansas the impression that there was any disposition in the world to do their State injustice or to cut down these appropriations wantonly. If I know myself, speaking for one member of the committee, I have every disposition to meet their views so far as I can consistently with public duty. It may be that the committee were misled by the language of the report, but I will call the attention of the Senator to the conclusion of the supplemental report, upon page 1626 of volume 2, part 2, of the engineers' reports. That report is made by Max A. Orlopp, jr., assistant engineer. Captain Taber says:

Referring to my letter of November 12, 1884, I have the honor to inclose the report of an assistant sent to make a further examination of the Red River above Fulton. Taken in connection with my report as contained in that letter it sets at rest the question of the desirability of improvement above the mouth of the Kimishi River.

Captain Taber first alludes to the improvement of the river above Fulton, and then he says:

It sets at rest the question of the desirability of improvement above the mouth of the Kimishi River.

It is true that in a former report there was an estimate made for the improvement of the river above Fulton, which is above the great raft. In the subsequent report, upon the page which I have mentioned, is the summary by this assistant engineer of his survey and the results of his observation, he says:

In order to improve the Red River—

Not mentioning the Red River between the Washita and the mouth of the Kimishi, but "in order to improve the Red River," as a matter of course above Fulton, because that was the heading of his survey and that was where he made his observation:

In order to improve the Red River so as to make navigation possible for six months in the year it would be necessary to confine the water to a channel of not more than 200 feet in width. This would require the buildjng of dams, dikes, and bank protections upon a material which can not be controlled except by the expenditure of a large amount of money for very elaborate work, the execution of which is not warranted by the amount of commerce which the country has.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. VEST. I am reading from the supplementary report of Mr. Orlopp, assistant engineer, contained in volume 2, part 2, of the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. On what page?

Mr. VEST. I have given the page, 1626. It is the summary of his report and the last report that was made to the Secretary:

The problem of transportation has been clearly demonstrated by the railways, without taking the river as a factor.

I submit if this engineer meant what he said, he meant the river above Fulton. If he meant the river between the Washita and the mouth of the Kimishi, he ought to have said so. He is speaking now about using the river and improving it as a factor above Fulton, or else I entirely misapprehend the English tongue.

In order to make the river navigable from the mouth of the Washita to the mouth of the Kimishi—

He goes on to say, meaning the whole river above Fulton—

In order to make the river navigable from the mouth of the Washita to the mouth of the Kimishi River, a distance of 110 miles, it would require not less than $10,000 per mile, making a total amount of $1,100,000, and it is questionable if this large amount would make the improvement permanent.

It is not advisable to make any estimate of the cost of improvement above the Washita, as in some years the river carries no water for a month, and during the remainder of the year the volume of water is so small that it could not be put to any practicable use.

The construction which the Senator from Arkansas puts upon this language is that it applies simply to the Washita and the Kimishi, whereas the language of the report is the Red River. I am not opposing the wish of the Senator from Arkansas to reject the amendment, because it seems to be the disposition of the Senate to overrule the committee as to all these changes in the bill. I have no personal feeling about it. I was governed in my action by the report of this engineer, and it is for the Senate to look upon this language and to pass upon this question. I wish to say just here that there never was a more ungrateful task than that of constructing a river and harbor bill. If you cut down an estimate it is a personal matter immediately with the Senators from that State; if you do not increase it it is equally a personal matter; and between the two things, and the criticisms of the Senator from Kansas and others who have no navigable streams in their States, the committee is emphatically between the devil and the deep sea.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that I have no disposition whatever to make this a personal matter with the Senator from Missouri or with any one else. I simply state in view of these reports that the first report referred to the Red River in Arkansas above Fulton, as it states; and the engineer recommends that an appropriation be made for that purpose. Afterward a subsequent survey was ordered for the river above that point, that is, from the mouth of the Kimishi to the mouth of the Washita. He states that that improvement he thinks would cost more than the Government ought to undertake at this time. That is conceded, but I state that he does report that $10,000 are necessary for the Red River in Arkansas above Fulton. The House appropriated $7,000, and I ask the Senate to retain the clause as it came from the House at $7,000.

As to the criticism upon the committee for the bill I have nothing to say. I simply assert that this is necessary to the commerce of that river, and that I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In confirmation of what my colleague has just stated the letter of Captain Taber, transmitting the report from which the Senator from Missouri has just read, says:

Taken in connection with my report as contained in that letter it sets at rest the question of the desirability of improvement above the mouth of the Kimishi River.

The mouth of the Washita is above the mouth of the Kimishi. The report as read by the Senator from Missouri does set at rest the question of improving the Red River above the mouth of the Kimishi and toward the mouth of the Washita, but it does not touch the Red River from Fulton, Ark., toward the mouth of the Kimishi, and the appropriation as proposed here was not even to reach the Kimishi or go half way to the Kimishi, but was simply to go from Fulton up toward the Texas line.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the amendment is disagreed to as reported by the committee of the Senate, of course the text is restored as it came from the House. That being so, this is the appropriation:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, Texas, and the Indian Territory, above Fulton, Ark., $7,000.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me one moment? I stated that the words "Texas and the Indian Territory" were there by mistake, and of course naturally misled the committee. They were put there by an amendment by one of the members from Arkansas through a misapprehension of the facts in the House of Representatives, and they ought not to be there, and I propose to move to strike them out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it was a mistake in the House, it was certainly a mistake which accords with certain facts in the reports of the engineer for the improvement of this river.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will turn to page 1617 he will find that it does not accord with the facts of the report of the engineer. It is headed "Examination of Red River above Fulton, Ark." Neither the Indian Territory nor Texas is named. That is on page 1617, and on the following page the engineer says:

The proper outfit for this work is a hand snag-boat, costing about $4,000. It will cost about $1,500 per month for running expenses. Four months' work ought to put the stream in fair shape at a total cost of $10,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. But the desire to improve this entire river, and to expend the appropriation upon the river as recommended by the House, would of course embrace the whole extent of the river, and the Chief of Engineers would direct the expenditure of the money upon the whole of the river in Arkansas, Texas, and the Indian Territory. It can not be otherwise.

Mr. BERRY. I have twice stated, if the Senator will allow me, that I proposed to strike out the words "Texas and the Indian Territory," so as to make it apply according to this report to the Red River above Fulton, in Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. It is in order now, and now is the time to move that amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Very well, I will offer the amendment now to strike out the words "Texas and the Indian Territory;" so as to read:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, above Fulton, Ark., $7,000.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not know what the committee had in view. I happen to know the points, however. Fulton is in the State of Arkansas. The mouth of the Kimishi is a point in the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, where the river Kimishi empties into the Red River. Immediately opposite is the county of Red River, in the State of Texas. That is the situation between Fulton, Ark., and the mouth of the Kimishi. I know both points of the country well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 915 and 916, it is proposed to strike out the words "Texas, and the Indian Territory;" so as to read:

Improving Red River, Arkansas, above Fulton, Ark., $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee striking out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is the amendment as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. The original text of the bill was amended before the proposition to strike out was put. The proposition to strike out has failed and the original text as amended stands.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 918 and 919 of section 1, as follows:

Improving Little Red River, Arkansas, $3,000.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I find the report relating to that river by Captain Taber to be very short, and it seems to me to be conclusive on this question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. From page 1612, volume 2, part 2. He recommends on this page an appropriation of $8,400, and sets out the advantages of improving the river, and states the necessity for its being done, it seems to me in very clear and distinct terms. Three thousand dollars was appropriated by the House where about $9,000 is recommended. Under the circumstances it seems to me there could be no excuse for striking out that appropriation, especially when the engineer reports:

From report of Assistant Engineer M. A. Orlopp, herewith, it appears that—

First. Judsonia is the highest point warranting plans of improvement for low-water navigation.

Second. For rafting a very trifling expenditure will greatly benefit the stream for the entire distance over which this industry is carried on.

Third. The commerce to be benefited is unusually large, this stream being located in a very prosperous section of the State.

Fourth. His report gives all the data necessary to make an enlightened estimate of the amount required without further survey.

Fifth. The present commerce, from his report, amounts to about 13,500 bales of cotton yearly, and merchandise imported 4,700 tons.

* * * * * * *

Future commerce is hard to estimate, but this section is regarded as one of the most promising ones in the State. Its reputation as a fruit-growing country is growing very fast.

Sixth. The problem of improvement is very simple and admits of a certain solution, and may be briefly summed as follows:

1. Remove the bowlders that interfere with rafting above Judsonia.

2. Remove the shoals 3 miles below Judsonia that interfere with low-water navigation to Judsonia.

The assistant's report will be found appended and marked A.

* * * * * * *

From the data submitted herewith it is recommended that $8,400 be expended upon this stream, substantially as follows:

Cutting channel 3 feet deep through the shoals 3 miles below Judsonia..... 8,000

Further remark seems unnecessary, as this case is such a simple one, and the benefits to be derived so large compared with the outlay.

I am perfectly willing to rest the case on the language of the report of the officers, and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. We will rest upon that.

The amendment was rejected.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed an act (S. 2732) to authorize the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late John F. Miller.

RAILROADS IN MONTANA—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 2281, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the Indian reservation in Northern Montana."

The reservation referred to stretches across the extreme northern part of Montana Territory, with British America for its northern boundary. It contains an area of over 30,000 square miles. It is dedicated to Indian occupancy by treaty of October 17, 1855, and act of Congress of April 15, 1874. No railroads are within immediate approach to its boundaries, and only one, as shown on recent maps, is under construction in the neighborhood leading in its direction. The surrounding country is sparsely settled, and I have been unable to ascertain that the necessities of commerce or any public exigencies demand this legislation, which would affect so seriously the rights and interests of the Indians occupying the reservation.

The bill is in the nature of a general right of way for railroads through this Indian reservation. The Indian occupants have not given their consent to it, neither have they been consulted regarding it, nor is there any provision in it for securing their consent or agreement to the location or construction of railroads upon their lands. No routes are described, and no general directions on which the line of any railroad will be constructed are given.

No particular organized railway company engaged in constructing a railroad toward the reservation and ready or desirous to build its road through the Indian lands to meet the needs and requirements of trade and commerce is named. The bill gives the right to any railroad in the country, duly organized under the laws of any Territory, of any State, or of the United States, except those of the District of Columbia, to enter this Indian country, prospect for routes of travel, survey them, and construct routes of travel wherever it may please, with no check save possible disapproval by the Secretary of the Interior of its maps of location, and no limitation upon its acts except such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

This power vested in the Secretary of the Interior might itself be improvidently exercised and subject to abuse.

No limit of time is fixed within which the construction of railroads should begin or be completed. Without such limitations, speculating corporations would be enabled to seek out and secure the right of way over the natural and most feasible routes, with no present intention of constructing railroads along such lines, but with the view of holding their advantageous easements for disposal at some future time to some other corporation for a valuable consideration. In this way the construction of needed railroad facilities in that country could be hereafter greatly obstructed and retarded.

If the United States must exercise its right of eminent domain over the Indian territories for the general welfare of the whole country, it should be done cautiously, with due regard for the interests of the Indians, and to no greater extent than the exigencies of the public service require.

Bills tending somewhat in the direction of this general character of legislation, affecting the rights of the Indians reserved to them by treaty stipulations, have been presented to me during the present session of Congress. They have received my reluctant approval, though I am by no means certain that a mistake has not been made in passing such laws without providing for the consent to such grants by the Indian occupants and otherwise more closely guarding their rights and interests; and I hoped that each of those bills as it received my approval would be the last of the kind presented. They, however, designated particular railroad companies, laid down general routes over which the respective roads should be constructed through the Indian lands, and specified their direction and termini, so that I was enabled to reasonably satisfy myself that the exigencies of the public service and the interests of commerce probably demanded the construction of the roads, and that by their construction and operation the Indians would not be too seriously affected.

The bill now before me is much more general in its terms than those which have preceded it. It is a new and wide departure from the general tenor of legislation affecting Indian reservations. It ignores the right of the Indians to be consulted as to the disposition of their lands, opens wide the door to any railroad corporation to do what, under the treaty covering the greater portion of the reservation, is reserved to the United States alone; it gives the right to enter upon Indian lands to a class of corporations carrying with them many individuals not known for any scrupulous regard for the interest or welfare of the Indians; it invites a general invasion of the Indian country, and brings into contact and intercourse with the Indians a class of whites and others who are independent of the orders, regulations, and control of the resident agents.

Corporations operating railroads through Indian lands are strongly tempted to infringe at will upon the reserved rights and the property of Indians, and thus are apt to become so arbitrary in their dealings and domineering in their conduct toward them that the Indians become disquieted, often threatening outbreaks, and periling the lives of frontier settlers and others.

I am impressed with the belief that the bill under consideration does not sufficiently guard against an invasion of the rights and a disturbance of the peace and quiet of the Indians on the reservation mentioned; nor am I satisfied that the legislation proposed is demanded by any exigency of the public welfare.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 7, 1886.

Mr. DAWES. With the consent of the Senator from Minnesota I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I desire to have go along with that remarkable message the section of the treaty which has affected the President so sensibly in the draught of this message. I desire to have it understood that the committee who reported the bill thought they were regarding the rights of the Indians. The eighth article of the treaty to which reference is made in the message is in these words:

ARTICLE 8. For the purpose of establishing traveling thoroughfares through their country, and the better to enable the President to execute the provisions of this treaty, the aforesaid nations and tribes do hereby consent, and agree, that the United States may, within the countries respectively occupied and claimed by them, construct roads of every description; establish lines of telegraph and military posts; use materials of every description found in the Indian country; build houses for agencies, missions, schools, farms, shops, mills, stations, and for any other purpose for which they may be required, and permanently occupy as much land as may be necessary for the various purposes above enumerated, including the use of wood for fuel and land for grazing, and that the navigation of all lakes and streams shall be forever free to citizens of the United States. (Treaty with the Blackfeet Indians, October 17, 1855, 11 Statutes at Large, pages 658, 659.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to make a report at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I report by direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations the bill (S. 2208) to amend and enlarge the fifth section of an act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868," with an amendment and a written report prepared by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], a member of that committee, who had the matter in charge, but who on account of the illness of a member of his family is detained from the Senate; and I make the report on his behalf.

I have not had an opportunity, nor has the committee, to examine the detail of the statements which are made in his report, and the circumstances occupying all his time by the illness of his family may possibly have led him, as he had to write the report absent from Washington, into some minor errors. I do not know that that is so, but I think it is due to him to say that the report was written away from Washington, and if any little error should appear it can be accounted for in that way. It is the report of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to submit the minority report in that case, and I ask that it be printed with the majority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and the report printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the views of the minority will be printed with the report of the majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be taken.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles E. Creecy, assignee of A. Elsberg and others, for compensation for property taken and used by the United States authorities for public purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2803) granting a pension to Michael Fitzpatrick, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2818) to increase the rate of pension for deafness and loss of sight; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2243) to increase the rate of pension for deafness, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask to have that bill read?

Mr. BLAIR. I will state to the Senator that several bills have been referred to the committee increasing the rate of pension for deafness and for defective sight. It has been thought best, and in fact the only thing we could do, to report an original bill which covers all.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the original bill been read?

Mr. BLAIR. The original bill has been read and the other indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRISON. That I did not understand.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7728) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Collins; and

A bill (H. R. 1617) for the relief of George H. Laurence.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred a resolution of March 24, 1886, directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gas Light Company shall not exceed $1 per thousand cubic feet, and the bill (S. 1567) regulating gas works in the District of Columbia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2819) relating to the manufacture and sale of gas in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and amendatory of an act entitled "An act regulating gas-works," approved June 23, 1874; which was read twice by its title.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a permit to Caleb W. Spofford and his associates to erect a hotel upon the lands of the United States on the main beach at or near Horseshoe Cove, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There ought to be a provision in the joint resolution that the United States should pay for building the hotel. It seems to be insufficient as it is now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. RANSOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill and an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DIGEST OF OFFICIAL OPINIONS OF ATTORNEYS-GENERAL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the Digest of the Official Opinions of the Attorneys-General of the United States from 1789 to 1881; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of J. B. Francis and 43 other citizens of the first Congressional district of Georgia, the petition of W. F. Henderson and 192 others citizens of the fifth Congressional district of Georgia, and the petition of George S. Cassin and 140 other citizens of the fifth Congressional district of Georgia, praying for the passage of the following measures at the present session:

1. House bill No. 7887, repealing timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts;
2. House bill No. 7021, for adjustment of railroad and other land grants;
3. Bills forfeiting all railroad land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with;
4. House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma;
5. Senate bill opening a part of the great Sioux reservation to settlement;
6. Bill prohibiting aliens from holding lands in the United States;
7. Bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays, and punishing bribery;
8. Bill directing disbursement of at least $200,000,000 Treasury surplus, and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of A. J. Thompson and 500 other citizens of the twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of C. J. Lorella and 50 other citizens of the ninth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of A. W. Baker and 81 other citizens of the twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of S. F. Hickey and 34 other citizens of the twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of G. W. Thompson and 205 other citizens of the twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of John Maynard and 206 other citizens of the thirteenth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of J. F. Gibson and 175 other citizens of the thirteenth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of George W. Durk and 56 other citizens of the sixth Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of H. Hammond and 65 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of Henry Kane and 138 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of George Pierce and 263 other citizens of the third Congressional district of Missouri, the petition of R. M. Austin and 110 other citizens of the second Congressional district of Missouri, and the petition of James A. Kennedy and 110 other citizens of the thirteenth Congressional district of Missouri, praying for the passage at the present session of Congress of the following measures:

1. House bill No. 7887, repealing timber-culture, pre-emption, and desert-land acts;
2. House bill No. 7021, for adjustment of railroad and other land grants;
3. Bills forfeiting all railroad land grants the conditions of which have not been strictly complied with;
4. House bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma;
5. Senate bill opening a portion of the great Sioux reservation to settlement;
6. Bill prohibiting aliens from holding land in the United States;
7. Bill making Presidential and Congressional election days holidays, and prohibiting bribery;
8. Bill directing disbursements of at least $200,000,000 Treasury surplus, and substituting Treasury notes for bank notes retired.

The petitions were refeered to the Committee on Finance.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out the following clause, from line 924 to 928, inclusive, of section 1:

Improving White River, Arkansas: Continuing improvement, $18,000; thirteen thousand of which, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to complete the survey of said river; the remainder for general improvement.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. This amendment, as recommended by the committee, it seems to me, from the reports of the engineers, would have been a most natural one. The members of the House who are interested in the improvement of this river, finding that there was no estimate made for the improvement of the river, addressed a note to the engineer in charge, calling his attention to the omission. I have in my hand the letter from the acting Chief of Engineers, dated March 18, 1886, addressed to Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House, in which he says:

Referring to communication from this office of yesterday's date in relation to the improvement of White River, Arkansas, I beg now to state that in reply to a telegram from this office, Capt. H. S. Taber, Corps of Engineers, reports that $13,000 will be required to complete White River survey, and $10,000 can profitably be expended on the improvement during the year 1887.

Captain Taber's report, which is inclosed in this letter, contains the following language:

My recommendations for the White River seem to have been overlooked in some way; I trust you have them before you by this time. This is the most interesting river in my district and one in every way worthy of improvement.

I should have felt greatly disappointed had no appropriation been provided for it. I have a very broad, far-reaching plan for this river, which will make it I believe one of the grandest arteries of commerce in the country.

I have asked for $13,000 to complete the survey and $10,000 for temporary improvements during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

With the balance now on hand and the $10,000 I can keep a very excellent low-water channel open to Buffalo Shoals for two years or more. This will not add much to the sum already expended in temporizing with the river.

It seems to me that by some omission the recommendation made by Captain Taber for the improvement of this river was left out of the Engineer's report. This, as is apparent to every man familiar with the stream, was a glaring mistake, and when the attention of the Chief of Engineers was called to the fact he supplied the omission by sending in this estimate. I hope the committee will not insist on striking out what has been recommended by the engineers.

Mr. VEST. I merely wish to call attention to the singular fact that this mercenary and selfish and sinister Committee on Commerce—I believe it has been termed even that—did make a report here in accordance with the report of the engineer bureau, and that according to the light we had at the time we were fully authorized to strike out the item in the bill. The only report that we had (for until to-day I never heard of any supplemental report) showed that the amount appropriated by the act approved July 5, 1884, was $35,000 for the improvement of the White River, and on July 1, 1885, the amount available for this river was $24,806.61. That amount was unexpended; and the report of the engineer antecedent to this estimate states that until the survey is completed, which would not be until this fiscal year, it was not deemed expedient to expend any more money upon this river. This supplemental report, which seems to have been sent to the House of Representatives, never reached the Senate Committee on Commerce at all.

I desire further to call attention to the singular fact that this stream, White River, is a most important river transportation to the southern portion of my own State. It runs through Taney County, Missouri, and Forsyth, the county seat, is one of the principal ports upon that stream. Still, as I am principally responsible for striking out this item, although it was a river very important to the people of Southern Missouri, the singular fact remains that I was willing to strike out the item because I thought that this expenditure of money under the report of the engineer was not proper. As a matter of course under this supplemental report I have no opposition at all to the reinstatement of the clause as proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I only wish to add that the statement of the Senator from Missouri is entirely correct in regard to this report. We have never seen or heard of this supplemental report in the Committee on Commerce, and the report of the Chief of Engineers which was before the committee would not justify any appropriation on our part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 928, to insert:

For removing the rock shoals in Fourche River, Arkansas, situated 4 miles south of Perryville, in Perry County, Arkansas, according to the plans of the engineers for creating a 50-foot channel, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 943, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

Improving Cumberland River, Tennessee and Kentucky: Continuing improvement above Nashville, with a view to secure in the channel a depth of 4 feet, commencing with the lock at or near the lower island at Nashville, $50,000.

Mr. HARRIS. I regret the necessity of asking the Senate to disagree to this amendment. The Cumberland River above the city of Nashville has 335 miles of navigable water. The estimate of the engineer as to the amount that can be profitably spent in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is $400,000. The appropriation is reduced from $100,000, inserted by the House, one-fourth of the amount that can be profitably spent, to $50,000, one-eighth of the amount, by the report of the Committee on Commerce.

I beg to suggest to the chairman of that committee and to the committee and the Senate that under the plan of improvement, which is lock-and-dam improvement, the appropriation of $50,000 to this object is perhaps to bury that amount, at least for the time being, if not to throw it away entirely. It is not an amount sufficient to complete the work of a single lock; and therefore it would be practically suspended for one or more years, if not absolutely thrown away, while the $100,000 appropriation as proposed by the House may at least complete one such lock and open and improve the navigation of quite a large stretch of navigable water.

I therefore hope that the Senate will not agree to the amendment reported by the committee. This improvement when completed will open and make navigable for almost, if not the entirety, of each year 335 miles of river above Nashville, when the river below that city is 192 miles, aggregating nearly 600 miles of navigable water, running through a very fertile and a highly productive agricultural and mineral region of Tennessee.

I therefore hope that the amendment reported by the committee will not be agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. The report of the engineer in this case shows that there were $29,000 and upward available on the 1st of July, 1885, the close of the fiscal year, and between Nashville and the head of Smith's Shoals is a distinct reach of this river. The engineer says that the amount available and the appropriation asked for, $400,000, "can be profitably expended in operations above Nashville, in building locks and dams, and in such open channel work as will be needed whether the lock-and-dam system is carried out or not, the work to be carried on in a tentative manner, so as to ascertain just how far wing and training dams can be used in place of the lock system."

We thought with this amount available, and with the addition of $50,000 for this year, the tentative work would go forward and the experiment could be determined how far these wing and training dams could be used in place of the lock system, and then, when that matter was determined, it would be time enough to begin to make appropriations for the lock system. The amount appropriated by the last bill was also $50,000, the sum that is proposed to be appropriated by the committee in this bill. We thought that sufficient until the character of this work was fully determined and all the experiment solved. Therefore we reduced the amount from $100,000 to $50,000, which we think still is amply sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I should like to have the Secretary read from the report of the engineer on page 1760 what I have marked for the consideration of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The estimates for the improvement of the Cumberland River have been based on the idea that the appropriations would be made for the entire work in a reasonable time, say four or five years; but in the case of the river below Nashville the annual amounts have been so small that although fifteen years have elapsed since General Weitzel made his estimate, the full amount has not yet been appropriated; and above Nashville only $50,000 have been appropriated for a system of locks and dams estimated to cost over $4,000,000, at which rate it would take eighty years to complete the work. Of course it would be impossible to carry on work with proper economy under such conditions, and I would respectfully urge that Congress may give the subject its due consideration, and if the more radical system of improving this river under the existing projects is decided to be advisable in view of the necessities of commerce, an appropriation of at least one-tenth of the estimate for completing the work may be made.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It will be seen from that report that it is actually trifling with a very great interest, and one in which the Government has heretofore embarked a large amount of money, to make this small and inadequate provision. If the Congress of the United States means to improve this river, so valuable to the commerce of the Ohio Valley and the Mississippi Valley and so rich in present result and far-reaching in what it promises, it is a duty, an economic duty, that we owe to the Government, to make the appropriation recommended by the engineers, or, as stated by my colleague, to give at least one-fourth of it, as proposed by the House. It is proposed now to give but one-eighth. I concur in the opinion expressed by my colleague that it is trifling and almost idle to make the appropriation recommended by the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think from the statement read from the report of the engineers the Senate will be satisfied that the amendment recommended by the committee should be adopted. The engineer refers to a project which, when entered upon, will be the construction of a system of locks and dams which will cost $4,000,000. Before that system is entered upon every doubt as to its propriety should be removed, every difficulty should be solved; and that is why this appropriation of $100,000 should not be made; but $50,000 may properly be expended this year upon the river to determine what will be necessary in order to make it navigable for the purposes indicated in the report, or whether it will be necessary to enter upon this great system of expenditure of $4,000,000 for locks and dams on this river.

I can scarcely see what good it would do if, at the request of the Senators from Tennessee, this amendment should be adopted, and when we come to vote upon the bill they will vote against the amendment and against the bill as the Senate committee amends it and against the whole bill. I can not see why the Senators from Tennessee should be persistent about urging this amendment, particularly as the facts in the case clearly support the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask if there is a river in the United States with the same length of navigable waters, that is appropriated for in this bill at all, which is not appropriated for very much more liberally than this river with its nearly 600 miles of navigable waters?

Mr. McMILLAN. I think in view of the improvements contemplated this river has received as liberal an appropriation as any other. I have distinctly stated that it was not deemed advisable by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate that we should enter upon the improvement projected of locks and dams, to cost $4,000,000, until all the doubts and obstacles were removed. When that is done, then we shall see what the river can be brought to, and then we can determine whether or not Congress would be justified in entering upon this other project of locks and dams.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to say that so far as these doubts can be solved by engineering they have been solved and the work is already entered upon. But I should be glad to ask the Senator from Minnesota one other question: Was his committee controlled in its recommendations by the estimates of the Engineer Department; and, if so, upon what principle have they recommended the various appropriations that have been recommended? Have they been governed by a percentage of the amounts estimated, or have they arbitrarily sat in judgment upon the various estimates, allowing full estimates in some instances, 50 per cent. of the estimates in others, 25 per cent. in others, 12½ per cent. in others, and striking out altogether others? I should be glad to know what principle has controlled the action of the committee in the report they have made to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. We have been controlled in our action in regard to this river by the same rule which has controlled us in regard to other rivers. This estimate of $4,077,922 is for a system of locks which are here referred to. The amount available and the appropriation asked for, $400,000, the engineer says, "can be profitably expended in operations above Nashville, in building locks and dams, and in such open channel work as will be needed whether the lock and dam system is carried out or not, the work to be carried on in a tentative manner, so as to ascertain just how far wing and training dams can be used in place of the lock system."

Those are the facts upon which we based our amendment to the bill in this case, and the $100,000 would be entirely useless for the expenditure for this year if we were not going to enter upon this great system of improving the river by locks and dams; but then to improve it and complete the improvement within the time recommended by the engineer in charge of the improvement the appropriation ought to be very much larger than $100,000.

If this amendment is adopted the amount will go to improving this river by the system adopted by the engineers for the purpose of determining whether the improvement by locks and dams will be necessary or not and whether we may enter upon this great expenditure.

I assure the Senator from Tennessee that that is the rule by which we were governed in regard to this appropriation, as we have been governed in all others by a desire to appropriate what will be really profitable, as we understand it, in the improvement of these public streams.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator think the engineers did not understand what could be profitably expended?

Mr. McMILLAN. As I stated before and have stated several times, the estimate made by the engineer is in view of the fact that Congress shall determine at this time to enter upon the improvement of the river by locks and dams which shall cost nearly $5,000,000. Those are the facts upon which he based his recommendation for the amount he asks for, and the other facts stated by the engineer justified the appropriation made by the amendment of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate as we have reported it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this question, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], who has been called away from the Chamber for a short time. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 949 and 950 of section 1, in the following words:

Improving Hiawassee River, Tenn.: Continuing improvement, $2,500.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall detain the Senate but a moment upon this amendment. I do not find at this moment the estimate I was looking for, but there was $2,500 appropriated in the last river and harbor bill for the improvement of this stream. It runs through a very fertile and highly productive region, and is navigable only for about 33 miles. The amount was not sufficient in the opinion of the engineer to do profitable work, and hence that $2,500 was not expended. The estimate is that an appropriation of $2,500 will enable them to complete the work on that 33 miles of navigable water in a highly productive region of the State of Tennessee. I therefore hope that the $2,500 appropriation will be made and the amendment of the committee disagreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not feel very much encouraged in regard to the result of these votes on the amendments recommended by the committee. However, the Senate is assuming the responsibility of increasing the amounts appropriated by the bill as reported. They are doing it upon their own authority—in some cases without any recommendation from the engineers and in others against the recommendations of the engineers. So the members of the Committee on Commerce are relieved from responsibility in that regard, and other gentlemen who are in favor of the appropriations made by the river and harbor bill or opposed to any appropriations by river and harbor bills who vote for these increases, of course are willing to assume that responsibility.

This appropriation is referred to in the report of the Chief of Engineers in volume 2, part 3, on page 1764, as follows:

No work has been done upon this river during the fiscal year, nor since active operations were suspended in November, 1882.

No commercial data have been obtained. The following extract from previous annual reports are still applicable:

"The commerce is partly carried on by steamboats from the Tennessee River and partly by flat and keel boats.

"The appropriations for this river have been so small for several years past that a considerable portion of them has necessarily been expended in taking care of the plant, and other expenses that are constant, whether much or little be done.

"This has made the work actually done cost excessively, and it can not be otherwise with such small appropriations. With the $2,500 now available, which will be applied to such points as are most in need of improvement, this river will be put in a fair boating condition, and I would therefore respectfully recommend an appropriation of at least $5,000, or that the work be suspended as soon as the funds available are exhausted until Congress deems it advisable to make such an appropriation.

"The tools and other property can be removed to the Tennessee River, where a part of them can be used and the balance stored until they are again required for the Hiawassee without expense to the latter."

Upon that state of facts the Committee on Commerce did not deem it advisable to make the appropriation, but the Senate are at liberty to vote as they see proper on the question.

Mr. HARRIS. I will read now the last report of the engineer on this improvement. He says:

Hiawassee River, Tennessee——

Mr. MCMILLAN. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. HARRIS. From page 276 of volume 2, part 1, of the report of Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I read from the same report, part 3.

Mr. HARRIS. The engineer says:

3. Hiawassee River, Tennessee.—This river is a tributary of the Tennessee. The plan of improvement, based upon an examination made in 1874, consists in removing surface obstructions, &c., so as to secure a channel 40 feet wide and 2 feet deep from the mouth to Savannah Ford, the virtual head of navigation, 33 miles.

The total amount expended up to June 30, 1885, is $28,868.47, and has resulted in securing a greatly improved channel from the mouth to Savannah Ford, but all the shoals have not been, as yet, improved according to the project.

No work was done during the year. The appropriation herein estimated for and the balance available can be profitably expended in completing the projected work if it be made in one appropriation; with a smaller amount the work can not be economically done, and there is no commercial necessity for an outlay of money not so expended.

It appears by the report that there is a balance of unexpended appropriation of $2,500, and with the appropriation made by the House, according to the report of the engineer, this work can be completed and that 33 miles of navigable water put in comfortable shape so that it may be utilized.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will allow me to correct him. The appropriation made by the House is $2,500; and the engineer states that it is entirely useless to make such an appropriation, and, if desirable at all, it should be increased to $5,000.

Mr. HARRIS. The last appropriation of $2,500 remains wholly unexpended, because the engineer said such an expenditure could not be profitably made upon that work.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And he says that $5,000 must be appropriated or it will not be worth while to make any appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. The unexpended balance and the $2,500 are necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Blair,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Sherman,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 951 and 952 of section 1, as follows:

Improving South Fork of Forked Deer River, Tennessee: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 958, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Improving Tennessee River at Big Muscle Shoals, Little Muscle Shoals, and Elk River Shoals, Alabama: To complete improvements at these localities, $250,000.

Mr. PUGH. As a common-sense proposition I respectfully submit that there can be no reason to support this amendment.

The national importance of opening navigation through these shoals can not be questioned. The Government has expended on this work $2,100,000. It is now approaching completion. The engineer in charge reports that $350,000 will complete the work and open navigation through these shoals. Now, the committee's proposition is to delay this work two years by failing to appropriate the amount named in the House bill and cutting off $100,000. Shall we do that or shall we add the $100,000 appropriated by the House and have this work completed in one year, so that the country can derive the benefit of the large amount of money heretofore expended?

I can not believe that the committee would have moved this amendment if in possession of the knowledge that I have obtained upon this subject since the bill was reported. I have a telegram from the engineer in charge, as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 2, 1886.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER, Washington, D. C.:

Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars will surely complete Muscle Shoals improvement. Letter will follow.

J. W. BARLOW, Engineer.

Here is the letter written on the same day:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Chattanooga, Tenn., July 2, 1886.

SIR: I reply to your dispatch of last night. I telegraphed you this morning that "three hundred and fifty thousand will surely complete the Muscle Shoals improvement."

I arrive at this conclusion, as follows:

At the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in addition to work done at several other shoals upon the river, including Little Muscle Shoals, there had been expended on the two sections of the canal, namely, Big Muscle and Elk River Shoals, the approximate sum of $2,100,000.

At this time Major King made a careful computation of the work done on these sections, and estimates of that remaining to complete. He ascertained that 75 per cent. of the whole had then been accomplished. The remaining 25 per cent. of work at the previous rate would therefore cost $700,000. Since then, by act of July 5, 1884, $350,000 was appropriated, leaving the further sum of $350,000 still required.

The work mentioned above as having been done at other points on the river has not in all cases completed those projects; more work should be done as soon as practicable, and with this object in view the last estimate of $550,000 was submitted.

In their present condition these shoals do not entirely obstruct navigation as does the Muscle Shoals. When, therefore, the canal improvement is finished the whole river from Chattanooga to the mouth will be open to navigation.

From my own examinations of the present condition of the work I have no hesitation in giving it as my decided opinion that the sum of $350,000 will essentially complete the Muscle Shoals improvement and open the canal.

Nearly all the masonry of the several locks has been finished. All of the gates except the upper-gates of five locks have been built, and are now being placed in position. The abutments and piers of the aqueduct over Shoal Creek have been built; the iron girders and the steel sheets for the same are being put in place. Much of the canal connecting the different locks has been excavated and the tow-path constructed.

The following are the principal items remaining unfinished:

Parts of canal excavation.
Reconstruction of portions of tow-path.
Erection of several dams and bridges.
Small amount of lock-masonry.
Placing several lock-gates in position.
Constructing five lock-gates.
Putting in place and riveting aqueduct plates.
Constructing and adjusting appliances for maneuvering lock-gates.

I beg also to state that as $250,000 will not complete the improvement, should that sum be retained as the amount appropriated the language should be changed to read "continuing improvement" instead of "to complete."

I am, with great respect, very truly, yours,

J. W. BARLOW,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The last appropriation of $350,000 for this great work was made upon the understanding that that was half the amount necessary to complete it, and it was well understood at the time when that $350,000 was appropriated that the next appropriation should be $350,000 to complete it; and upon these facts I state that this amendment has no foundation to support it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, there is no doubt about the important character of this improvement. That was not doubted in the committee. But the amount appropriated here we thought was larger than was necessary for this year.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator pardon me? I failed to read a letter from the Chief of Engineers upon this same subject.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall be glad to hear it. That is subsequent to the report of the committee?

Mr. PUGH. Yes; it is dated July 6, and written to myself. It is as follows:

SIR: Your letter of the 5th instant just received.

The estimate of $550,000 submitted in the last annual report from this office was for continuing the improvement of the Tennessee River below Chattanooga, embracing operations at Muscle Shoals and in removing obstructions in other parts of the river between Chattanooga and Paducah. It is believed, in view of the statements of Colonel Barlow, the officer now in charge, that the sum of $350,000 will complete the work at the Muscle Shoals and open the canal to navigation.

At the request of Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER there is transmitted herewith for your information a letter addressed to him on July 2 by Colonel Barlow.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. PARKE,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

Hon. J. L. PUGH,
United States Senate.

If those shoals are opened to navigation the Tennessee River will then be open to navigation for over 700 miles through a country full of minerals and of great agricultural advantages and wealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will be seen from the report of the engineers that—

Total amount expended on this work to date	$2,574,993 72
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	1,437,500 00
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1887	550,000 00

This is for "improving Tennessee River at Big Muscle Shoals, Little Muscle Shoals, and Elk River Shoals, Alabama: To complete improvements at these localities, $250,000."

That is the amendment recommended by the committee, striking out "three" and inserting "two," a reduction of $100,000.

This portion of the Tennessee River from Chattanooga to Paducah, 456 miles in length, is now navigable, excepting at the Muscle Shoals, where about 23 miles of obstructions are in process of removal. The completion of this work will connect 367 miles of navigable water in the Tennessee above Muscle Shoals (besides hundreds of miles in its navigable tributaries), with 252 miles of river below Muscle Shoals, and thence with the entire Mississippi system.

That shows the importance of the work; and the only question is as to whether the sum of $350,000 shall be appropriated instead of $250,000, when the estimate of the engineer of the amount that can be profitably expended is $550,000.

Mr. PUGH. That estimate was for the purpose of completing the work at the Muscle Shoals and other work along the river; but that other work along the river can be delayed. If the Muscle Shoals are opened to navigation the river can be navigated for nine months in the year without improvement in other parts of the river.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The appropriation as it came to us in the House bill was for—

That was the appropriation made by the House. The estimate of the engineer is $550,000 to be expended during this year upon these improvements, Big Muscle Shoals, Little Muscle Shoals, and Elk River Shoals, in Alabama. Certainly if $550,000 can be expended this year in continuing the work, it can not be possible that $350,000 or $250,000 would complete it, and the amount we appropriate is about 50 per cent. of the estimate of the engineer.

I do not dispute the importance of this work. The committee are fully aware of the importance of the improvement; and the only question is one of the judgment of the committee as to the amount that can be properly expended.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that this question narrows itself down to this: The Government has appropriated over $2,000,000 for the improvement of the Muscle Shoals. The recent letter from the Chief of Engineers read by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] shows that with an appropriation of $350,000 within the year the canal may be finished and the navigation through the Muscle Shoals opened. Unless that amount is appropriated you postpone the opening of navigation through the Muscle Shoals for one or more years, and the over $2,000,000 that you have already appropriated to that work lies there idle and without the possibility of being utilized, when by making the appropriation as the House made it that great work may be completed within the year and the $2,100,000 already expended utilized at once.

The question for the Senate to decide, it seems to me, is, will it make the appropriation of $350,000 now, or dole out the $250,000 and postpone the utilizing of that great work for one or two years longer before you can get the benefit of the $2,100,000 already expended? In view of the fact that Congress unquestionably will now or hereafter appropriate the additional $100,000 necessary to the completion of the work, it seems to me not a debatable question as to when it should be done. If done now, within a year that work will be completed. If not appropriated now, the time of completion is postponed one or two years longer. That is the whole question, as it appears to me, which is now submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 960 and 961 of section 1, as follows:

Improving South Fork of Cumberland River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think this is of sufficient importance to warrant me in detaining the Senate for a moment. This is a continuing work, which has already been begun. The Engineer Department recommend an appropriation and the House has agreed to $5,000.

The South Fork of the Cumberland River permeates the greatest lumber, coal, and mineral region in the State of Kentucky. I do not know what reasons induced the committee of the Senate to recommend that the appropriation should be stricken out. I do not propose to detain the Senate upon the question, but, unless there be some reason known to the committee that I am not furnished with, I trust the Senate will not support the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is an improvement of the Kentucky River, and consists——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The chairman is mistaken. It is the South Fork of the Cumberland River.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What is the estimate for that improvement? Does the Senator find it?

Mr. VEST. It will be found on page 1770, volume 2, part 3.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator may refer to that report if he will.

Mr. VEST. The report of the engineer is as follows:

IMPROVEMENT OF SOUTH FORK OF THE CUMBERLAND RIVER, KENTUCKY.

Rising in Tennessee this river flows north into Kentucky and empties into the Cumberland River at Point Burnside. That portion above the mouth of Clear Fork is known as New River.

From its mouth to Dick's Jumps, 31 miles, the river is from 200 to 400 feet wide with a total fall of 76 feet. Above this point numerous sandstones bowlders of immense size are scattered in its bed, rendering improvements at a reasonable cost impossible.

The present plan of improvement, based upon an examination made in 1881, consists in removing bowlders, excavating a channel through rock reefs and gravel bars, and building riprap dams to contract the water way, so as to secure safe navigation when there is a tide of at least 3 feet above low water.

Active operations were resumed early in October, 1884, at Sloan's Shoals, and continued, in local charge of Assistant Engineer W. C. Crozer, with an average force of men, until February, 1885, when the available funds were exhausted.

The season's work was confined entirely to Sloan's Shoals and Robert's Mill Shoal, and suffered from several interruptions, caused by sudden rises in the river.

The following are the items of work done:

Solid rock blasted from channel	cubic yards...	556
Loose rock excavated	do.....	368
Stone quarried for riprap	do.....	108
Riprap dams built	do.....	1,665
Trees cut down and removed	number...	161

No commercial statistics have been obtained, but the present commerce is principally in saw-logs.

There are numerous outcrops of coal of splendid quality along the banks of the river awaiting its improvement to be mined and shipped to market.

The amount asked for ($10,000) can be applied to carrying forward the present plan of improvement from the mouth of the river to Devil's Jumps, near the Kentucky State line. Most of the projected work will be practically permanent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was not my purpose to call for the yeas and nays whether this amendment was agreed to or rejected. I am willing to let the decision be made by a division if it suits the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Well, I shall be satisfied with a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will regard the call for the yeas and nays as withdrawn, and a division will be had.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No quorum has voted. We shall be compelled to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HALE] is detained in the committee-room on an appropriation bill, and has been there the whole day. This is my first announcement of his necessary absence. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I am paired generally with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but I vote on this proposition, believing he would vote as I do, "nay." I also voted on the proposition next preceding, on which proposition I felt sure that he would vote "nay," as I did. That was in regard to the Muscle Shoals in Alabama.

Mr. BROWN. He would undoubtedly have voted "nay" if present.

Mr. PLUMB. I make this statement for his benefit, he being absent.

Mr. BECK (after having voted in the negative). I thought the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was in the Chamber when I voted. I find he is not, and I withdraw my vote. We came in together and I thought he was still here.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea." If his colleague [Mr. CHACE] were present, I am told he would vote "yea;" and I will take the liberty of voting.

Mr. PLATT. His colleague voted "yea," and then stepped out.

Mr. CAMDEN. Under the statement that the colleague of the Senator voted "yea" on this amendment, I vote "yea" also.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have been paired during the day with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who is very busily engaged in the Appropriations Committee, and I have voted once or twice where I was satisfied he would have voted the same way I did if he were present. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I shall not vote.

Mr. CAMDEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have concluded to withdraw my vote to prevent any misunderstanding.

Mr. COKE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] has been paired with me by his colleague [Mr. BUTLER]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I am satisfied my colleague would vote "nay" on this amendment if he were present, and I have requested the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to pair with him, and he has consented to do so.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 963, to reduce the appropriation for "improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement," from $250,000 to $100,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This is an amendment submitted by the committee, the amount of reduction in which and the importance of the work involved make it of sufficient consequence to call the attention of the Senate to it.

The bill as it came from the House appropriated $250,000 to the continuation of this work. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate recommend a reduction to $100,000, striking out $150,000 of the amount.

The facts of this case are that the State of Kentucky many years ago undertook to improve the slack-water navigation of this river for a distance of 261 miles from its mouth where it empties into the Ohio at Carrollton up to Beattyville, a distance of 261 miles. The State never asked a dollar or a penny from the Federal Government in aid of its effort, but through a long term of years the State of Kentucky expended more than a million of money upon the system of locks and dams on this river. In 1879, after having expended millions of money from the State treasury upon it, the State made a cession of all the property to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government undertook to continue the improvement of the navigation of this river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the date of that act of cession?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there an act of Congress which accepts it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, yes, sir. It was regularly done. The Legislature of the State of Kentucky ceded all the property, all the improvements upon which the State had already expended this sum of money. I do not know about the act of Congress to which the Senator from Vermont alludes, but from the year 1879 till now, with one exception, that being the year when no river and harbor bill was passed, regular appropriations have been made by Congress for the continuance of the work on this river. Whenever there has been a river and harbor bill passed since 1879 this river has been represented by appropriations varying from $100,000 to $150,000 a year.

These locks and dams had fallen measurably, not into disuse, for they have been continually in use, but they needed repairs; and the Government up to this time has expended the money which has been appropriated yearly by Congress, not in the construction of any more dams and locks, for the State of Kentucky had built five, beginning at the mouth of the river, that answered all the purposes for a distance of probably 150 or 160 miles. The Government has expended its money in repairing the locks and dams that the State of Kentucky had already built.

The Engineer Department report here now the commercial statistics, the length of the river. The navigable portion of it that it is proposed to cover with this system of locks and dams is 261 miles, and for the year 1884–'85 the aggregate commerce, as shown by the commercial statistics of the Kentucky River, was $5,358,446.15, and then above the point on this river which it is proposed to reach by the system of locking and damming was an additional commerce that was, as shown in the statistical table, $482,290 for the year 1884–'85. The report goes on to show that—

The present project for the improvement of this river was adopted in 1879, the object being to repair the five locks and dams built by the State of Kentucky, and extend slackwater navigation for a draught of 6 feet, by the construction of additional locks and dams, to Beattyville, a distance of 261 miles from the mouth of the river.

Four of the original locks have been repaired and three of the dams rebuilt and the fourth partially repaired.

The operations during the past year have consisted of making further repairs to locks and dams Nos. 1 and 4 and commencing the repairs to lock and dam No. 5. The river between lock No. 5 and Shaker Ferry, a distance of 44 miles, was also cleared of snags and leaning trees which obstructed the channel.

So that the work for the last year has reached 44 miles above the fifth, the last lock, measuring from the mouth, that has ever been constructed there.

The purchase of the land for the lock and dam No. 6—

Which will be the first lock and dam to be constructed by the Federal Government—

The purchase of the land for the lock and dam No. 6 and the dam at Beattyville was not completed.

During the present fiscal year it is proposed to complete the repairs at lock 5 and rebuild the dam. The land for lock and dam No. 6 and the dam at Beattyville will be obtained, and the work at both of these places commenced. The obstructions in the river channel between Beattyville and the crossing of the Kentucky Central Railroad, a distance of 80 miles, will be removed.

With the amount asked for it is proposed to complete lock and dam No. 6—

A new dam to be built now—and commence the construction of additional locks and dams.

Submitted in compliance with requirements of section 2 of river and harbor acts of 1866 and 1867.

Mr. President, there is a work upon which the State of Kentucky has expended more than a million of money, and upon which since 1879 the Federal Government has expended $1,050,000, and for the completion of which it is estimated that the sum of two and a half millions will be required upon the report and recommendation of the engineer in charge. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House reported the bill carrying $250,000 to this purpose. The Senate Committee on Commerce has seen fit to reduce, or to propose to reduce, that amount to $100,000.

It is a work of great consequence to us. According to these commercial statistics in this last year you see that over five and a half or nearly six millions of value has passed through this river in its uncompleted and not half-finished state; and I can not think that the sum of $250,000 is disproportioned to the value of the work and the best interests of the Government in completing a work which it can not afford to abandon; and this view is supported by the engineer in charge and by the committee of the House who prepared this bill.

I trust, Mr. President, that this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I ask him how many steamboats are running on that river now?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think some eight or ten.

Mr. VEST. Running from the mouth up?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; 44 miles above the farthest lock and dam that has ever been constructed, up to Shaker Ferry.

Mr. VEST. To the Kentucky Central Railroad bridge?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Up to the Kentucky Central bridge.

Mr. MAXEY. Suppose that the river be improved in accordance with the plan recommended by the engineers, how many months in the year will it be suitable for navigation?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Every day in the year. We only lost thirteen days last year. I am obliged to the Senator from Texas for his interrogatory. If this work is completed and the engineers' estimates are regarded, and their opinions are of value, we shall have a 6-foot draught for 260 miles and more of that river every day in the year.

Mr. President, I had forgotten to say that this is the first year that the work of constructing originally, building a lock and dam, is to be attempted by the United States Government. Hitherto small appropriations have been expended for several fiscal years upon repairs on dams and locks that were more or less dilapidated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much has been appropriated in former years?

Mr. BLACKBURN. One million fifty thousand dollars in seven years.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think the Senator from Kentucky stated that that amount has been expended by the Government. Did the Senator from Kentucky say that $1,050,000 had been expended by the Government?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; I said that $1,050,000 had been appropriated.

Mr. MANDERSON. And of that amount but $535,000 has been expended?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of that amount $535,000 had been expended up to a year ago; but I beg the Senator to bear in mind the information that I have—and I have none that does not come from my colleague who is a member of the committee in the other House, and his information as given to me is only from the engineer in charge—that there is no unexpended balance that is not already covered. I speak in round numbers. The unexpended balance is already provided for by outstanding liabilities and is not available; and this is the first year when the Government, having completed the repairs of the old locks and dams, is now called upon for a heavier expenditure in beginning the construction of new ones.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me, I should like to ask a question in order to have the facts go into the RECORD. If the river is improved according to the plans of the engineers, would it not bear steamers as well as other craft capable of carrying large cargoes?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir. Through its course of 261 miles it can be made permanently navigable for good-sized craft and steamboats. It would drain as rich a lumber and as rich a mineral region as can be found upon this continent. It does do it now to the extent of six millions of commerce a year, and when these improvements are completed that will be more than quadrupled.

I trust, Mr. President, in the face of the facts as submitted to us here, that the Senate will not refuse to allow us to have what the House bill proposes, $250,000.

Mr. VEST. Let me understand the Senator from Kentucky. Does he mean to say that $264,000 has been expended since July 1, 1885, without constructing a single lock?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir. I say there has never been any work done by the United States toward constructing a lock yet.

Mr. VEST. I see from the engineer's estimate of July 1, 1884, the amount available was $74,452.06; the amount appropriated by the act of July 5, 1884, our last river and harbor bill, was $250,000. That made together $324,452.06, there being $74,452.06 not expended for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1884. Up to July 1, 1885, with $324,452 on hand, the engineer only expended $59,730.26; so as to make the amount available July 1, 1885, $264,721.80.

Mr. KENNA. Will my friend from Missouri allow me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator from Missouri is very familiar with all the items in the river and harbor bill. The point is that the Engineer Department come here in the beginning of the session in December—their report dates back to the preceding 1st of July—and the bill does not get through Congress until about the succeeding 1st of July. Here is an entire fiscal year passed, and the whole of a year's work is to be deducted from the amount of money on hand when that report was made. We are acting now on the report of the engineers made on a basis a year old.

Mr. BECK. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri an additional fact, if he will allow me. I went to Mr. WILLIS, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, the other day and inquired if this balance reported was on hand. He said he had received a letter from the engineer in charge, which assured him that every dollar of this balance reported as on hand was contracted for in the preservation, repair, and putting in order of the old locks and dams which the Government received from the State of Kentucky, and that the money which was to be appropriated now was needed to build one lock, and that it would require $250,000 to do it.

Mr. VEST. The reason I asked whether this $264,000 surplus had been expended without building a single lock was because I find upon page 1880 of the report of the Chief of Engineers, in volume 2, part 3, a statement of the total expenses of repairs, salaries, current and contingent expenses, and all these objects, being an "estimate of the cost of maintaining navigation during the fiscal year 1885–'86," amounting to $25,615, including "removal of snags and dredging, $2,000."

For 1886–'87 the same estimates for current and contingent expenses, salaries of lock-keepers, &c., and repairs, amount to $12,400. These are all expenses for 1885–'86 and for 1886–'87.

I recollect very well when the engineers came in and asked $500,000 when the last river and harbor bill was pending, and said they had spent all of it; and yet the estimate shows that, instead of spending all of it, they spent $59,000, and had on July 1, 1885, a balance unexpended of $264,721.80.

Mr. BECK. That was a year ago.

Mr. VEST. I understand that; but how could they spend that without building a lock, with an annual expense, the largest that has ever been made, for salaries, contingent expenses, and dredging, $25,000, and in the current year 1886–'87 the estimate for all these expenses is $12,400? It is impossible that they could have spent $264,000 without building a single lock. They must have on hand at a reasonable estimate $240,000 at least.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The only information I have is that they have nothing on hand. If it be impossible, as the honorable Senator from Missouri seems to make it appear, that this money should have been expended, then it simply amounts to saying that it is impossible for the Engineer Department of this Government to tell the truth, because here is their report, and they give the amount down to the fraction of a cent that has been expended, and here it is $535,278.20 up to twelve months ago.

Mr. VEST. I understand that, but here is their estimate for July 1, 1885, or rather their report that they had on hand $264,721.80.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Can the Senator from Missouri tell what amount of that has been expended in the last twelve months?

Mr. VEST. I say if they have not built a lock and dam—and the Senator from Kentucky says they have not—they can not have expended that much. As I understand, now they want $250,000. Five hundred thousand dollars they report that they require, but this $250,000 is to build a lock, and that will be the first lock built by the Government of the United States. I so understand. They can not need it for current expenses.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know where the Senator from Missouri gets his information. He certainly does not understand that from me unless I have been exceptionally and exceedingly unfortunate in making myself understood. I say that the engineers in this report show that they want this $250,000, that they state the purpose for which they want it. They want it to continue to complete—

During the present fiscal year it is proposed to complete the repairs at lock 5 and rebuild the dam. The land for lock and dam No. 6—

Which will be the first new one built by the Federal Government—and the dam at Beattyville will be obtained, and the work at both of these places commenced. The obstructions in the river channel between Beattyville and the crossing of the Kentucky Central Railroad—

Away beyond any point that has been reached yet either by the State or Federal Government in the matter of improvement—a distance of 80 miles miles, will be removed.

Now, I understand that they mean to do all that with this $250,000, to complete the repairs of the last lock and dam to be repaired and buy the land for the new lock and dam and to begin the construction of that, and to remove the obstructions from the river channel for a distance of 80 miles from Beattyville to the crossing of the Kentucky Central Railroad. I understand in very plain English the engineers to declare that all these purposes are included in the demand that they make for that $250,000.

Mr. VEST. We have a right to judge the future by the past. The same engineer bureau will spend the money in about the same way as heretofore. In 1883 they had $250,000 and on July 1, 1884, they had $74,452 which they were not able to spend. In 1884 we gave them $250,000 more, making $324,452; and on July 1, 1885, they had available $264,721. Now they come in and ask for $500,000 and say they can expend it. We have a right to suppose that they will have about an equal balance left next July.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator undertake to state to the Senate that there are $250,000 of unexpended appropriations for this river now?

Mr. VEST. I do not know how much is on hand. There was nothing before the Committee on Commerce to show what was on hand. We have got these figures and these figures alone. If there is any subsequent or supplemental report, where is it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Missouri will permit me to direct his attention to page 1872 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers. Under the title "Proposed operations for 1885–'86" he will find in the first paragraph a statement that perhaps will explain this balance. It appears from the statement that there was a balance of $324,452.06 remaining on hand on the 5th of July, 1885, when this report was made; and in the first paragraph as to the proposed operations as stated by the Chief of Engineers he says:

During the fiscal year it is expected to complete the lock-house at No. 1 and dam No. 5, and the improvement of the channel of the upper river, and also commence the construction of the dam at Beattyville. The land for lock and dam No. 6 will be acquired, and contracts made for the purchase of as much of the materials required in their construction as the balance of the funds on hand will permit.

They intend to apply this balance to these purposes. That is the statement. Clearly the balance on hand at the date of this report was $324,452.06. The proposition of the work for the year is stated in this report.

Mr. VEST. I see the amount asked for is to continue the improvement by the construction of additional locks and dams.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The recommendation in my last annual report, that authority be granted by Congress to obtain the land needed for the new locks and dams, in extending the slack-water improvements in advance of the appropriations being made for their construction, is renewed.

He still asks for an advance appropriation for the purpose of acquiring land for new locks in advance of commencing the work.

Mr. VEST. I want to call the attention of the Senate to these figures in order to emphasize my opposition to this and similar schemes, and I use the word "scheme" in no offensive sense, certainly not to my native State; but I want to emphasize my opposition to this custom of States that are perfectly solvent commencing works of internal improvement and then when they find they are not profitable unloading them on the national Treasury.

Fifty years ago the State of Kentucky commenced an internal system of improvements in that State on the Kentucky River, the Barren River, and the Green River. The bills were carried through the Legislature of Kentucky by a combination between the votes of the Green River members and those of the blue-grass part of the State. It was supposed Kentucky was about then to have a system of internal improvements unequaled throughout the Union. In 1879 Kentucky unloaded the Kentucky River improvement (which had gone to utter ruin and decay, as the engineer says in a report that is here) upon the General Government, and there is a proposition in this bill now to unload the Green and Barren River improvements on the Government.

It is estimated that it will be necessary for the General Government to expend for the completion of the existing project $2,221,639.25. That is the amount that is to be appropriated besides what has already been expended upon this river. And yet the State of Kentucky is perfectly solvent, perfectly able to carry on these improvements, or at least to sustain them in their present condition, because it is by no means a bankrupt State. My remarks apply equally to the two other similar projects in this bill which I opposed in committee.

When a State is absolutely solvent, when she has and boasts that she has no outstanding indebtedness, I say that that State should not come to the General Government any more than a private company should come that has gone into an improvement of this kind and finds that it drags upon its hands—should not come to the General Government and ask it to assume this work and to make good the indebtedness already accrued.

If this State were a poor, bankrupt State, ravaged and ruined by war, and should come here holding up its hands and pleading its poverty, I would go as far as any Senator on this floor to assist and help that State in the work of improving the public water ways. But in this instance I thought in committee and think now that this amount should be cut down. I am not willing to vote in advance $150,000 or $200,000 for the purpose of erecting new locks and dams upon this stream. I know the Kentucky River very thoroughly. I was born upon its banks. It is a small, narrow, deep stream, with overhanging trees. The Senator says there are steamboats upon it. I have not been upon the river for a long term of years, but I recollect very well when but two steamboats navigated the stream, running up to the mouth of the river, and possibly one to Cincinnati and occasionally to Louisville.

The upper portion of the river is given up entirely to the transportation of coal and lumber, and unless its character has changed very much it is a small, narrow, deep stream. While I am perfectly willing to vote an adequate amount to improve that river, an amount that is necessary at the present time, I am not willing to put up in advance one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars for these engineers to come in in their next report and say that there is an unexpected balance of seventy-five or one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. I say this with no sort of feeling against the State, and with no other desire than to do my duty as I understand it to be.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire simply to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the engineers, which I think will explain the basis upon which this large amount is asked for. After describing the improvements of some of the locks and dams that are in process of erection the report proceeds—I read from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army for 1885, part 3, page 1871:

A survey of the river from Oregon to Beattyville has been completed by R. S. Burnett, assistant engineer, and sufficient data obtained to locate all the dams required in the extension of slackwater to the Three Forks.

Senators will understand the geography perhaps who are better acquainted with the river.

According to this survey the length of the Kentucky River is 261 miles from its mouth to the Three Forks, and the fall 211.2 feet in the same distance, or at the rate of 9.7 inches to the mile. The first five locks and dams, as soon as No. 5 is completed, will have a combined lift of 71.9 feet, and give a depth of 6 feet for navigation a distance of 98 miles. This leaves a fall of about 140 feet to be overcome by additional locks and dams. It is believed this can be accomplished by the construction of eleven dams if they are given a slightly increased height over that originally proposed.

LOCK AND DAM NO. 6.

Efforts have been made to obtain the site for this lock as authorized by act of July 5, 1884; but up to this time they have been unsuccessful, owing to the difficulty in obtaining a good title to the land needed.

DAM AT BEATTYVILLE.

The commencement of the dam at Beattyville has also been delayed because of the difficulties in obtaining the land required. It is believed that these have now been overcome, and nothing will prevent the beginning of this dam at an early date.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE UPPER RIVER.

The inhabitants of the Upper Kentucky Valley are unprovided with means for bringing their produce to market, except they use the mountain roads and the river during freshets. The former are frequently impassable from snow and ice, and their use at any time is difficult. The period during which the river is available is greatly reduced by the obstructions it contains. To remedy this evil, during the delay in the extension of slack-water navigation, application was made for authority to expend $1,500 of the amount appropriated for the Kentucky River in improving the river channel from Beattyville to the Kentucky Central Railroad Bridge, a distance of 80 miles. This project was approved, and parties are now being organized for the work. It will consist of the removal of snags, trees, and rocks and the construction of wing-dams concentrating the water upon the bars. It is expected this improvement will give a channel at least 60 feet wide, with a minimum depth of 3 feet for nine months each year.

Now what is proposed for the coming fiscal year?

PROPOSED OPERATIONS FOR 1885-'86.

During the fiscal year it is expected to complete the lock-house at No. 1 and dam No. 5 and the improvement of the channel of the upper river, and also commence the construction of the dam at Beattyville. The land for lock and dam No. 6 will be acquired, and contracts made for the purchase of as much of the materials required in their construction as the balance of the funds on hand will permit.

The recommendation in my last annual report that authority be granted by Congress to obtain the land needed for the new locks and dams, in extending the slack-water improvements in advance of the appropriations being made for their construction, is renewed. Much delay in the progress of the work would in this way be avoided. The lack of such authority has prevented the dam at Beattyville from being commenced for the past three years, and already delayed the beginning of lock No. 6 one year. With the amount asked for it is proposed to continue the improvement by the construction of additional locks and dams.

It will be observed that the proposition is here to acquire all the land necessary for the construction of these locks and dams, stated by the engineer to be eleven additional. So it commits the Government to go forward with the construction of every lock and dam, or else we lose the amount expended. It is not prudent for the Government to commit itself in advance. Of course the engineers could expend this money in the purchase of sites for locks and dams, but that is not deemed advisable——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has the chairman any idea of the probable cost of the land for one of these locks and dams?

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I have not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the chairman know that in no instance will it reach the sum of $100?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sorry the chairman is not better advised on that subject.

Mr. McMILLAN. But it commits the Government to go forward with these improvements, and they can commence with the same fund on as many locks as they deem proper and keep them going on. It commits the Government to this entire work——

I do not think it advisable that we should put ourselves in a position where when we get up to a portion of this river which is really practically a benefit to navigation we should not be permitted to stop. The idea of constructing eleven more dams and locks above the six already in operation seems to me to be rather going too far.

In view of the state of facts as it appears from the engineer's report, we should be satisfied to appropriate this $100,000, complete the improvements that have been going on, and then from that standpoint look forward and see what further we shall do.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am sure that it was not necessary for the Senator from Missouri to disclaim any hostile animus toward the people or the State of Kentucky or their interests; but I confess that I am at a loss to account for the spirit in which he seems to have singled out this one item, the only one that the State of Kentucky can possibly have any concern in or interest about to be found in this bill. Neither do I see the necessity, with all due respect to that Senator, for the employment of such terms as "schemes" and "unloading," and I am more than glad to assure him that if he will reflect upon the condition of things he will see that Kentucky is not here with uplifted hand as a mendicant, as he described her coming before he would vote to aid her.

I do not understand the application of his charge that she undertook to unload an unprofitable scheme upon the United States. He said that she began the construction of these locks and dams for the improvement of the navigation of this river fifty years ago. Well, sir, will you kindly tell me whether the Federal Government fifty years ago was helping any State with an appropriation of a single penny to improve either by locks and dams or otherwise the navigation of any river? This whole policy of the system of river improvements, so far as the Federal Government aid has ever gone, is infinitely younger than the progressive effort of the people of Kentucky about which complaint is made here to-day.

The State of Kentucky has expended more money out of her own treasury by appropriation acts passed by her Legislature for the improvement of this river, than the Federal Government up to this hour has ever appropriated, and during all those years she never received a cent and never asked for a cent from the Federal Government. When she ceded this property to the Federal Government she ceded it without limitation, without encumbrance; dilapidated to some extent, I grant you, these works were, but not utterly worthless as the Senator has seen fit to describe, because they were doing their work and they were being used every year and every day in the year when the Federal Government took possession of them.

I do not see why the Senator from Missouri should seek to present the case to the Senate after such a fashion as to lead us to believe that there is a conspiracy between somebody upon the outside and the engineer officers of the Government upon the inside to extort more money in these yearly appropriations than it is either possible or desirable for them to use. If the engineer officers in charge of this work did not require the money asked for and did not believe that it could be and would be profitably employed during the coming year, why was it that they came here and asked deliberately on estimates for twice as much as the House bill proposes to give and five times as much as the Senate committee proposes to accord?

The facts have been stated, and I am perfectly content to ask the judgment of the Senate upon them. The State of Kentucky has expended more money upon these works than the Federal Government, and the Federal Government comes here through its accredited officer and demands twice as much as the House bill offers, five times as much as the Senate committee is willing to dole out.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I made no charge of any conspiracy against any engineer officer or anybody else. I think the figures given by the Senator were given to the Commerce Committee by this same engineer officer. What I complain of is that in the past they have asked for more money than they have ever been able to expend; and what I complained of, if the Senator from Kentucky chooses to adopt the word, on the part of my native State is that with an overflowing treasury, with no outstanding indebtedness, it now comes to the Federal Government and says, "Take off our hands an improvement that we inaugurate," not upon the ground that the State is not able to keep it up.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If a State must be a pauper before it can make a contract with the Federal Government within the limits and reach of a river and harbor bill, what answer will the Senator make for the States of New York and Pennsylvania and Ohio and his own, that have received more in this direction since he has been a member of the Senate than the State of Kentucky ever received since the foundation of this Government.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, my reply to the Senator from Kentucky is simply this: When the State of Missouri through its General Assembly undertakes a work of internal improvement in its own domain, within its own limits, and then with an overflowing treasury comes to the Congress of the United States and asks Congress to take that work off its hands, then his taunt to me will be applicable, and not before.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask the Senator from Missouri to answer me this question: The Government having accepted this property at the hands of the State of Kentucky in 1879, does the Senator from Missouri now propose to reopen the deed of cession and the act of acceptance by the Federal Government?

Mr. VEST. No, Mr. President; but I propose to stop where we are now and not to construct six more locks and dams at the expense of the Treasury of the United States upon that river. I am willing to put in repair the five we have received; I am willing to stand by the contract that was made by Congress in 1879; but I do not propose to go one inch further in this direction.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure the Senator wants the case fairly stated.

Mr. VEST. I do.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator from Missouri, then, mean to be understood as saying that the contract—if contract he terms it—between the Federal Government and the State of Kentucky made in 1879, when this property was ceded by the State to the General Government, stopped with the repairs of five locks and dams on that river?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I mean to take issue with the Senator and say very flatly that that contract has but one fair interpretation, and the Senator, if he will refer to it will not differ from me; and that is that the Federal Government agreed not to repair those five locks and dams, but to provide slack-water navigation to Beattyville, a distance of 261 miles, involving an absolute necessity for the construction of more dams than there had been already built.

Mr. VEST. I have never so understood that assignment, or contract, or whatever it may be termed, between the United States and the State of Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It so states in terms.

Mr. VEST. The Senator has referred to the State of New York. Suppose New York should unload, or if that word is offensive to the Senator——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not at all.

Mr. VEST. Assign to the United States the Erie Canal. New York is no longer able to take care of it; Congress should take charge of the work and keep it up. This is not the only project in this bill of the kind. The State of Kentucky comes now and proposes to put upon us works of internal improvements she has had for over forty-five years, works that have not paid, works that have gone to decay under the operation of the railway system of the country, and instead of pocketing the loss as a State or an individual should do, she proposes now to make the Federal Government stand the results of her own improvidence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the attention of my friend from Kentucky who has referred to an act of cession by the State of Kentucky of the works on this river to the United States. I understood him to say it was in 1879. I have sent to obtain the Kentucky statutes and owing to my incapacity to find it in the index—I dare say it is there—I ask him to point out to me (the statutes being here) what this act of Kentucky is.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The act of Kentucky, I will say——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator show us the statute?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I can not lay my hand on it. I have not the statutes before me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here they are.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That act was prepared by the Secretary of War in the War Office at my request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here are the statutes of 1879.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Kentucky states, as I understand, that the Congress of the United States passed some act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have searched the acts of Congress of 1879 and I can not find it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I said that there was a subsequent act of Congress in the way of appropriations made every year for the improvement of the river, and then an act of Congress passed directing the purchase of the land for the sites of locks and dams yet to be built. All these acts of Congress are subsequent to the cession made by the State of Kentucky. The State of Kentucky ceded all the property that she had. She unloaded nothing, and she is not to-day asking to transfer to the Government anything. It is seven years since she made a deed of cession of this property upon which she had expended more than a million of money; and the Senator from Missouri seems never to have found out the fact that that cession had been made, but is assured now that it was made and accepted in 1879.

The act of cession from the State of Kentucky ceded to the Federal Government every atom of property connected with what was known as the Kentucky River navigation improvement, every particle of it, whether it was in the shape of real estate or improvements put upon it, or appurtenances belonging to it. The Government accepted it seven years ago, and has been making these appropriations ever since, and the engineer officers to-day ask for $500,000 to do this work within the next fiscal year. The House committee cut it off a half, and the Senate Senate committee propose to reduce it to one-fifth. I appeal to the not to accept the amendment submitted by the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. Can we not take a vote on this question?

Mr. BECK. Before the matter is disposed of I desire to say something about it. The whole case has not been stated yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 8, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 7, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be permitted to make a brief statement in the nature of a personal explanation. I am sorry to take the time of the House to do so, but I fear that inadvertently I may have done or caused to be done some injustice or at least annoyance to some of my colleagues from New York.

It will be remembered that on Thursday last a yea-and-nay vote was taken on the question of inserting an appropriation in the sundry civil bill to inaugurate the statue of Liberty Enlightening the World in New York Harbor. It will also be remembered that the vote on that occasion was a very close one; and the proposition was declared to be lost on that vote by a slender majority, three only. I was exceedingly interested in the result, and hence tried to secure as many affirmative votes as possible. At the close of the proceedings, during a conversation with some other gentlemen, it was remarked that the amendment had been lost by the absence of certain New York members, and they were named to me as having been Mr. CAMPBELL of New York, Mr. CAMPBELL of Brooklyn, Mr. BLISS of Brooklyn, and Mr. MAHONEY of Brooklyn. I left the House under the impression that these gentlemen had been absent and did not vote. I went home and was ill during the night, so that I could not return to the House on Friday, nor did I see the RECORD of the proceedings of Thursday until Friday afternoon.

When on my way to New York the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PIDCOCK] loaned me a copy of the RECORD and I found the gentlemen whom I have named were recorded as present and voting. I was much surprised at the fact, and causually remarked to some gentlemen who were present, among them the editor of the Washington Post, that this statement, as shown by the RECORD, was contrary to the impression I had formed, based on the statement made to me and confirmed by my own recollection that these gentlemen were absent from the House at the time of that vote.

In the course of the conversation I was asked how it was possible that such a transaction could occur, and I said in response that I had no knowledge and believed it to be impossible unless four other names, voting the other way, had been appended to the roll so as to make it balance. I also said that it was a matter of so much importance that I would immediately on my return to Washington look into it, and would, if I deemed it necessary on such investigation, ask the House to inquire fully into it.

On Monday I returned to the city and immediately applied to the Clerk's desk for information as to the facts which I have just stated. I was shown at the desk the tally sheet which was taken by the Clerk at the time this vote was recorded, which disclosed the fact that these gentlemen had been present and had actually voted upon the first roll-call.

As a matter of course that would be conclusive so far as the tally sheet is concerned and as to the integrity of the RECORD, and ought to be conclusive of the whole question. I have no personal knowledge even now as to whether these gentlemen voted or not; but so far as I have done to them, or caused to be done, any injustice, or been the means of casting any reflection upon them under any misapprehension of the facts, I desire to state that I am exceedingly sorry, and wish therefore to make this explanation to the House in justice to them and to myself. I would have made this statement on Monday but for the absence of my colleagues, who are now here to make such explanation as may seem to them to be proper under the circumstances.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege in order to make a brief statement in connection with the matter which has just been alluded to by my colleague [Mr. HEWITT]. It was not my intention to say a word about it, although I had seen, of course, the statements in the newspapers; but as my colleague has introduced the subject, in justice to myself I wish to say that I was here last Thursday and on Friday and on Friday evening, and also on Saturday until the time when I left to go to New York—by the 3.50 train—I was here and voted, and the reason that I was not on the floor of the House at the time of the announcement of the vote (which fact the gentleman from Pennsylvania who sits near me now will bear out) was that Mr. William J. Fryer, of New York, the architect of the public buildings, was here——

Mr. RANDALL. That is correct.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. And I was in conference with him on public business. That was why I was not present when the announcement of the vote was made.

I desire to say further, in justice to the officials at the Clerk's desk, that I am not personally acquainted with the recording clerk of the House, Mr. Craig, I believe his name is; that I have never exchanged even the compliments of the day with him; and I make this statement in justice to the Clerk and the gentlemen who are connected with him; that I have not even a speaking acquaintance with any one of them but Mr. Smith, the Journal Clerk, whom I have known for some years, merely, however, to pass the compliments of the season with him when we meet.

This, Mr. Speaker, is an honest statement, which I think is due to these gentlemen and is also due to the House; and I hope we will hear no more of such business. In my judgment we have got just as fair a Speaker, and as good clerks, and as impartial, as have ever served in an assembly of this character during my legislative experience here and in New York.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, the gentleman was here and voted on that occasion?

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman I thought did not make that quite plain; and as I knew the fact myself I wanted him to make it explicit.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; I was here and voted and thought I had made the statement plainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that during the roll-call upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, as gentlemen will remember who were then present, there was a considerable degree of confusion prevailing upon the floor, and that it was a very close and somewhat exciting vote. The Chair is advised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL] that as a matter of fact he was not at the Capitol on that day, but was at Brooklyn, N. Y. As is well known there are four gentlemen on the roll of the House named Campbell, and in the midst of the confusion then prevailing another gentleman undoubtedly answered when the name of Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL was called. It appears from the roll-call that he was present and voted on the first call, which, as the Chair would explain if necessary, could not be the case unless some gentleman had answered when the name was called. The same error occurred again on yesterday; and in fact it is almost of daily occurrence, as gentlemen will doubtless remember who have paid attention to the calling of the roll. It often happens that the name of one gentleman is called and some other gentleman whose name has a similar sound will answer for him. The Clerk is ordinarily able to correct these errors in time, before the announcement of the vote is made; but on this occasion it was not done.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. A few words from me at this time will probably not be out of place. I notice in the RECORD of Friday my vote is recorded as having been given on Thursday. I was not in the city of Washington on Thursday. I requested my colleague [Mr. MILLARD] to have me paired during my absence, which he told me he would do. I desire now to say I made no request in the House or out of the House, of the Clerk or anybody else, to have my vote recorded in any way, directly or indirectly, and I had no conversation with any one about this vote.

Mr. MILLARD. My colleague [Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL] is correct in the statement he has just made. I saw him at the hotel after he left the House, and I said I would secure a pair for him. For some reason or other I neglected to do so. It was entirely an omission on my part.

Mr. BLISS. I also feel it is due to myself to make a personal explanation with reference to this matter. I have only to state that I was not here at the time the roll was called and that I did not vote for the proposition presented by my colleague [Mr. HEWITT]. I had been in and about the Hall during nearly the whole of the day, but I am not aware of having recorded my vote. It is due to the recording officers of this House, and a matter of justice to them, that I should say that I made no request prior to the vote or subsequent to it, or at any time, nor did I request any other person to ask that my vote be placed on the record. That is all I have to say and all I know about the matter. I will simply add that had I been present I would have cast my vote for the proposition of my colleague appropriating money for the Bartholdi statue of Liberty to be erected in the harbor of the city of New York.

Mr. HEWITT. I shall only say that I have never said at any time that any arrangement was made between these gentlemen and the clerks of the House about this matter. It was the newspapers that so stated.

Mr. BEACH. I call for the regular order.

RETURN OF BILL FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a concurrent resolution of this date I return herewith House bill No. 3501, entitled "An act granting a pension to Daniel J. Bingham."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] who made the request for the return of this bill is not in his seat. Meanwhile the message and accompanying bill will lie on the table.

ARETUS F. LOOMIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 7018, entitled "An act granting a pension to Aretus F. Loomis."

The Commissioner of Pensions, before he became aware of the passage of this bill, directed favorable action upon the application of the claimant pending in the Pension Bureau. A certificate has been issued for the payment of a pension to him, dating from September 30, 1882.

In the interest of the claimant I therefore withhold my signature from the bill, as the pension granted by special act would only date from the time of its passage.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to; and the message, with the accompanying bill, was accordingly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD M. HARRINGTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without my approval House bill No. 6648, entitled "An act for the relief of Edward M. Harrington."

It appears that this claimant was enrolled as a recruit December 31, 1863, and mustered in at Dunkirk, N. Y. He remained at the barracks there until March, 1864, when he was received at the Elmira rendezvous. From there he was sent to his regiment on the 7th day of April, 1864.

He was discharged June 15, 1864, upon a surgeon's certificate of disability, declaring the cause of discharge to be epilepsy produced by blows of violence over the hypochondriacal region while in the service, producing a deformity of sternum.

The claimant filed an application for pension in June, 1879, and in that and subsequent affidavits he alleged that while in barracks at Dunkirk, N. Y., and about the 9th day of January, 1864, and in the line of duty, he was attacked by one Patrick Burnes, who struck him upon the head and stamped upon and kicked him, breaking his collar-bone and a number of ribs, causing internal injury and fits, the latter recurring every two weeks.

It is hardly worth while considering the character of these alleged injuries or their connection with the fits with which the claimant is afflicted.

I am entirely unable to see how the injuries are related to the claimant's Army service.

The Government ought not to be called upon to insure against the quarrelsome propensities of its individual soldiers, nor to compensate one who is worsted in a fight, or even in an unprovoked attack, when the cause of injury is in no way connected with or related to any requirement or incident of military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the same order will be made as in the other case.

Mr. HOLMES. I object. I desire that the message be laid over for one day, to be called up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMES. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the message and the accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMES. I do not wish the bill to be smothered. I therefore move in amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the bill be laid over for one day and be considered to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That is not an amendment. There is no rule which allows bills to be laid over on the table except by unanimous consent. There is a rule which permits bills to be referred to committees on a motion that the consideration be postponed.

Mr. HOLMES. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMES. Would it be in order to move to postpone the consideration of the message and accompanying bill till to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. That would be in order. But the motion to commit under the rules has preference over the motion to postpone. The question must first be taken on the motion to commit, and then on the motion to postpone if the House refuses to commit. The bill is now before the House for consideration. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let me call the attention of the Speaker to page 457 of the Manual, where it is said:

A motion to proceed to the consideration of a vetoed bill with the objections of the President is a privileged question under the Constitution.

And on page 456 it is stated that the House may "proceed to the consideration of the bill or postpone its consideration for a future day."

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that. The Chair would decide it is a privileged matter to consider the bill now, and it is now under consideration; and being under consideration the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves to commit, which has preference over the motion to postpone.

Mr. BAYNE. Has the motion to commit precedence over a privileged question or a motion to postpone to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read clause 4 of Rule XVI, as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order; and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day at the same stage of the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was mistaken. The Chair was under the impression that under the rule the motion to refer had priority over the motion to postpone, but the rule as read shows it to be otherwise. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES] moves to postpone the further consideration of this message and bill until to-morrow.

Mr. HOLMES. I will make it Friday next, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMES; and there were—ayes 65, noes 78.

Mr. HOLMES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 51 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 121, not voting 103; as follows:

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMES. I wish to inquire whether it would now be in order to call up this bill and veto message for present consideration?

The SPEAKER. The bill is now up for consideration, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves to refer it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMES. But would a motion to consider the bill now have priority over the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]?

The SPEAKER. The bill is now up for consideration. If it were not, the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] could not be made.

Mr. HOLMES. Is it in order then to move that the bill and message be now considered?

The SPEAKER. It is, but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves to commit the bill and message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which is a proper motion under parliamentary law and the rules of the House. If that motion is voted down, the consideration of the bill goes on. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to commit the bill and message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. If these bills with the veto messages remain before the House they are privileged, and may be called up at any time; now, if they are referred to the committee, does that privilege cease?

The SPEAKER. It does. The right to have them considered by the House is suspended during the time they remain in the hands of the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. The right to call the bill up is suspended until the committee report it back?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose they do not report it back?

The SPEAKER. Then the case is the same as that of any other bill that is not reported back from a committee.

Mr. BURROWS. It is beyond the control of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, unless by unanimous consent, or a suspension of the rules, the committee be instructed to report it back.

Mr. LONG. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONG. In that case would not a motion to instruct the committee to report back the bill be a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not like to decide that question without some examination; but an amendment is in order now to the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], to instruct the committee to report a bill back on or before a certain day.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it in order to make that motion now as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I move to amend the motion so as to instruct the committee to report the bill back by Friday next.

Mr. MATSON. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. MATSON. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order. A simple motion to refer is not debatable, but a motion to refer with instructions is.

Mr. MATSON. If it is debatable I wish to say a word. There are already a large number of these vetoed bills before the Committee on Invalid Pensions that have been sent there prior to this. Why this particular bill should be taken up and preferred over others that have been heretofore referred, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions required to consider it, to the disadvantage of those other bills, I can not understand. If there is any special reason why this bill should be preferred over the others, then the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan ought to prevail, but no such reason being stated I do not see why this bill should be taken out of its order and the committee instructed to consider it and report it back in advance of the other vetoed bills.

Mr. BURROWS. In my amendment I have suggested Friday because I was informed that the Committee on Invalid Pensions would have a meeting on Friday, and therefore would not be called upon by the adoption of this motion to have an extra session of the committee in order to consider this bill. This is the only time that a motion of this kind has been made in regard to any of these bills. The gentleman from Indiana suggests that a large number of these bills with the accompanying messages are now pending before that committee, and that it would be hardly proper to direct the committee to report this bill on Friday in preference to the others. I believe that up to this time only two of the vast number of vetoed bills referred to that committee have been reported back; and in view of this fact it seems to me the indications are that the others are not to be considered; so that if the committee be directed to consider this one it will probably not interfere materially with their purpose in regard to the remainder.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that although the Chair does not desire to be understood as deciding the question of order in advance, still he is very much inclined to the opinion that, these being privileged matters under the Constitution, a motion to discharge the committee would be at any time in order. But, as the Chair stated just now, in response to a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], he prefers not to decide absolutely such a question in advance of its presentation to the House.

Mr. BURROWS. But the Chair holds that my motion to instruct the committee to report the bill on Friday next is in order?

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt in the mind of the Chair on that point.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that this objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is not well taken. In the first place, I may say by way of preliminary, there is nothing in this bill which should require it to be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It has once been very carefully considered by that committee; and the whole ground of the President withholding his approval of the bill is the fact that in his view the man was not injured in the line of duty. That is the only point in the case; and it is not neeessary to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in order to decide that question. The facts are all embraced in the report, which is itself a sufficient refutation of the veto message. This man was injured while in the line of duty. While he was in camp at Dunkirk, N. Y., a fellow-soldier named Patrick Burnes made an assault upon him, knocked him down, jumped upon him, and stamped upon him. As a consequence of this assault his sternum was injured, and he has been subject since that time to fits of epilepsy, clearly and plainly induced by the injuries which he then received.

Now, the President in his veto message says that whether this man was injured in a quarrel or by an unprovoked assault he is not entitled to a pension. The question then before this House is, whether a soldier when thus attacked in camp by a fellow-soldier and permanently injured is not to be regarded as having been injured in the line of his duty and entitled to a pension. That, I submit, is all there is in this case, as shown by the veto message and by the papers. It is clearly established that the injuries occurred while the man was in camp; there is no dispute about that in any part of the evidence. The question, therefore, is simply whether a man who is the victim of an entirely unprovoked assault, occurring while in camp and in the line of his duty, is entitled to a pension. This applicant at the present time is entirely unable to support himself by manual labor. Dr. H. H. Glidden, of Jamestown, N. Y., testifies:

I was surgeon of the board of enrollment at Dunkirk, N. Y., at the time the claimant enlisted; he was then a sound, healthy, and able-bodied man. About January 9, 1864, while at the barracks at Dunkirk, N. Y., and in the line of his duty, the claimant was attacked by one Patrick Burnes, and thrown to the floor, stamped upon, kicked, and beaten very severely, having his collar bone and several of his ribs broken. Burnes at the time was a member of the regiment; the assault was made wholly without provocation on the part of the claimant and for the purpose of robbery.

All the evidence goes to bear out this conclusion—that the man was assaulted for the purpose of robbery and without any provocation.

Mr. LONG. By one of his fellow-soldiers?

Mr. HOLMES. By one of his fellow-soldiers, and while in the line of duty.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What was he doing at the time? What was his duty?

Mr. HOLMES. He was in camp at the time he suffered this unprovoked assault.

A MEMBER. Read the certificate of discharge.

Mr. HOLMES. The statement contained in the certificate of disability for discharge is this:

Epilepsy produced while in the service of the United States by blows of violence over the right hypochondrium, producing a deformity of sternum; disability three-fourths; not fit for Invalid Corps.

H. McG. WILSON, Assistant Surgeon.

W. F. Tinke, of Coalville, Iowa, testifies:

About the month of June or July, 1864, while I was living at Frewsburg, N. Y., claimant came home from the service sick, from injuries received at Dunkirk, N. Y., and did no work of any kind. I do not personally know how he received his injuries. I saw him when he came home and he was treated by Dr. O. C. Gibbs, now deceased.

The certificates of all the physicians in this case go to show the utter disability of this man at the present time, his disability having been reported as three-fourths at the time of his discharge in 1864.

I submit that the House is now to decide in this case whether it is necessary that a proposition of this kind be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions or any other committee for determination, the question being simply this: When a man enlists in the armies of the United States and by an unprovoked assault, committed for the purpose of robbery, as is shown here, or indeed for any other purpose, is maimed and made a physical wreck, is he not to be considered in the line of duty at the time and entitled to a pension?

That is all there is of it. There is no pretense this was a quarrel. There can be no such thing inferred. There is no pretense that he got into a quarrel with his assailant, or that there was any quarrel whatever. To refer this veto message at this period of the session, with the experience we have already had in reference to veto messages of the President and their reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, is not encouraging so far as expectation of receiving any report is concerned before the adjournment.

Yesterday when my friend from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] asked to refer a veto message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions there was no objection particularly to it; at least the majority was in favor of that motion to refer the veto in that case to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is a little singular, it seems to me, that there should be desire to refer this veto message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, there to keep company with the veto message already referred to that committee on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was on the report of the committee.

Mr. HOLMES. That is true; but I submit this case is not like that so far as any difficulty of detail is concerned. There are not the details in this case there were in that case.

There can be no good reason why this case should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee has already reported, and it is not to be expected that committee will reverse its action. It is not to be supposed, after having already reported to the House on this case, that committee will come in here and say the report previously made by them was all wrong. Has the President shown any good reason to prove they have been wrong as to the facts of this case in the report heretofore made? No, sir; not at all. The difference between the President and the committee is a difference altogether as to a question of law. It can not be presented more fully than it has been already presented. It is for the House to say whether it will stand by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or reverse its action and yield to the statements of the President.

I have nothing more to say. This is a plain, simple proposition. This veto message should not be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but the House should be called upon to decide.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of referring this bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions with instructions to report it back at an early day. I have more than one reason for this. I do not propose to discuss specially the merits of this particular bill; but, Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to me, as I think it must be to all who have given the subject attention and consideration, that so far as the present Congress is concerned the question of pension legislation must be met and decided as a general proposition. I infer from the action of the majority who control this House that they have determined that there shall not be at this session any further general legislation on the subject of pensions; that they do not intend that any of these bills shall be passed over the President's veto, and that but few shall be considered at all.

I am in favor of the passage of this bill over the President's veto, as I believe it to be a just one, and I was in favor of the passage of the bill partially considered yesterday during the morning hour. But I entered my protest against the manner in which it was then considered by calling up that bill and allowing a statement to be made on one side which seemed to be in the nature of an excuse for all the vetoes sent in with an explanation that that case was an exception. And after this was done, and while gentlemen were seeking recognition who take an entirely different view of the whole question, all debate was cut off by a postponement of the case, and no opportunity was given by the House to gentlemen on this side to be heard. I want both sides of this question heard. I want the country to know that there is a contest here between the President and at least a majority of his party who agree with him on one side, and those who favor just pensions on the other side. I have no expectation that this difference can be reconciled, and I am willing that it shall be submitted to the people of the United States to decide after a full hearing.

For these reasons I do not think it is necessary to specially consider on this motion the merits of this particular bill. I want some course taken that will decide this whole question. I do not think, judging from his action in the cases that have been sent to him, that it makes any great difference whether a bill is a good one or a bad one to receive a veto at the hands of the present Executive. I think it must be conceded by all who are familiar with these cases that he has approved some of the very weakest and least meritorious, while a large majority of the bills which he has vetoed are deserving, worthy, and just.

But I do not think he wants it understood that he intends to make any particular difference between cases. He simply proposes to veto a large number of the bills that are sent to him. His reason is based on opposition to all bills of this character.

He is in sympathy with those who are at heart opposed to pensioning Union soldiers, and he intends to limit and restrict the number of those that shall hereafter be pensioned as far as it reasonably can be done. And if this position is taken in the early part of his administration, what may we not expect in the near future in the way of repeal of the legislation of the last twenty years should his party be retained in power? I oppose the proposition to refer the message without instructions to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee has been, I know, a most industrious and faithful one. I give it credit for great industry and fairness, as well as for its conscientious discharge of the duties assigned it. But the President has a majority of his party friends on that committee. I can hardly expect them to be very decided in their opposition to his action, and I would not be surprised if they are not disposed, as has been intimated by the gentlemen who preceded me [Mr. HOLMES and Mr. BURROWS], to act very industriously in bringing forward these bills. They have, it seems to me—perhaps unintentionally—by allowing attacks on their action on these bills to go unanswered, permitted a record to be made up at this session of Congress that does injustice to the committee and every member of this House that favors just pension legislation.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. I understood you to refer to the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and to express your belief that they are not disposed to act diligently in these matters.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; I so intimated.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not expect to make a speech on this question. I wish to say for that committee we have consumed nearly all the time allotted to us since these veto messages came in in considering them. I am authorized to say that where the facts show these bills ought to pass that committee will not hesitate to say so and authorize reports to be made to that effect.

Mr. JACKSON. I do not yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to make a speech like that which he made yesterday.

Mr. TAULBEE. My speech is made to suit myself and not the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; it may suit you, but it certainly does not suit me, and I want you to make it in your own time.

It is a remarkable thing, Mr. Speaker, that it takes this committee so long to examine these vetoes; for you will recollect that they are of cases with which the committee is familiar. These bills have been considered carefully by the Committee on Invalid Pensions before they are sent to the President.

And I may be allowed to call attention to the great care that is exercised in considering these bills. They are first referred to a subcommittee and carefully considered by gentlemen who examine the record and sift the testimony and make reports which are approved by a majority of the committee. They are then acted upon and passed at sessions of the House expressly set apart for the consideration of pension bills. After they have taken up this long time by their passage in the House they are sent to the Senate and again considered and passed, when they are sent to the Executive, who is supposed to have some other duty to discharge than vetoing pension bills. They have been in large numbers returned accompanied by veto messages to this House. These vetoes are so large in number and come in such great rapidity that we have from ten to a score in a single day. It is apparent that the President can not possibly give much time to the examination of the facts in these cases. For he is able to prepare and send in fifty or sixty vetoes in about the same length of time the Committee on Invalid Pensions has taken to consider and report back two of his vetoes to this House. This is why I think the committee is not quite in as much of a hurry now as the President.

But we are told by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that when these bills come back and go again to that committee they will be considered by it and proper reports made. But when it has these sixty or more vetoes referred to it and but two yet reported, weeks, and, I take it, months must elapse before we can get a report upon any considerable number of them. That is the reason that I do not want any such delay. The session is nearing its close. If we get a vote on these bills at all, and have an opportunity to put gentlemen on record on these questions, it must be done soon.

I do not see any necessity for delay. I favor bringing these bills back here to be considered at once. If it is the policy of this administration to oppose all pension legislation, if this is "a new departure" sprung upon the country, let us know it now and meet it. Gentlemen, do not longer leave any one in doubt as to your true position on this question.

Heretofore when a discussion of this question seemed proper we had gentlemen on our side on both the right and left who said to me we had better not stir it up; they said, "let it alone; we will get votes from the other side." If that is the way to get votes, by allowing men to get up and say, as was said on yesterday, what I do not believe, that the particular bill under consideration is a good bill and the committee recommend it, but that the others are not good, then I do not want to catch votes in that way.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman refers to me, that was not said.

Mr. JACKSON. If you propose to get a pension for one soldier by intimating that it is the only worthy one, that all or many of the others vetoed may not be worthy, then I can not go with you. This is what I call benefiting one at the expense of the many. On other occasions there has been great wrong done by many gentlemen on this floor by their unwarranted charges that pension legislation is generally called for by claim agents and unworthy soldiers.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to what I said as leading to such an inference, then he misstates what I said.

Mr. JACKSON. When do you want to make a speech; now, while I am speaking?

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not wanting to make a speech at all—only to correct the gentleman, if he refers to me.

Mr. JACKSON. I give the gentleman [Mr. TAULBEE] the benefit of his correction, and then I prefer to proceed in my own way. As I recollect it, the case on yesterday morning was introduced by saying that the committee believed the President "was under a misapprehension in regard to the facts of this particular case;" and that there was somehow or other something that he did not know or he would not have dared to send in his veto to this bill that gentlemen on that side of the House wanted to pass. But we were told that this great and good President, who vetoes pension bills by the score, meant right. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I suspect he does mean right in the sense of attempting to please certain elements of the country; but he does not mean right in the eyes of the generous and loyal people of this land. [Applause on the Republican side.] I desire to say, sir, that the President means exactly what his vetoes show. His vetoes, by their substance, language, tone, and temper, can have no other construction than that he dislikes all pension legislation, and I do not think that he will thank gentlemen for intimating that he is only trying to save, at best, the poor little pittance of money that is in controversy in granting these pensions.

No, sir; that is not what he means. These vetoes are intended for the approval of a certain portion of the people of this country, and I desire to say that they unquestionably meet their approval.

But they do not meet my approval. They will not, in my humble judgment, meet the approval of the majority of the people of this nation, and especially those who were always loyal to its flag. It is very evident that the only question which we are called on to meet now, and which I assure you will yet be an important one before the people, is whether or not we are to have proper and just legislation on the part of Congress in favor of the deserving soldiers of the Republic.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JACKSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not a fact, established by the records of this House and incontrovertible, that the present President has signed more private pension bills than any other President in the same length of time?

Mr. JACKSON. Quite likely that may be. But it is certainly true he has vetoed ten times more good ones than all of the others put together. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. He has probably had some worse ones to deal with than any other President.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, you have had a majority of your party on the Committee on Invalid Pensions. You have a majority in this House, and both, after careful examination, decided that the very bills he vetoed were just and deserving ones. And we will now see whether that majority will reverse its action because it has become a party question.

Mr. McMILLIN. And he has approved more private pension bills than any other President.

Mr. BRUMM. And he helped you to whitewash a traitor, too.

Mr. JACKSON. Your committee has not been, I am sure, too liberal with these pension bills, nor has the House extended that indulgence in their consideration that the soldiers had a right to expect. It is not easily forgotten that gentlemen have come here night after night at pension sessions and by their actions have indicated their purpose of preventing as far as possible pension legislation on the evenings set apart for that business. Such efforts are usually commenced by saying "we are willing to support all good pension bills," but actions speak louder than words, and it was plain they did not want to get any through if they could prevent it. I concede it was but a few who were willing to put themselves on record in this manner. But, as is well known, only a few are required to do a great deal of harm on such occasions.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the gentleman know that a large number of pension bills have been passed in opposition to the recommendations of the Pensions Committee?

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman name one?

Mr. JACKSON. Some may have been, but it has not been liberal enough. We could not get enough bills reported from the committee; but I am willing to give it credit for what it has done. I suppose the gentleman is correct in the suggestion he makes.

Mr. BRADY. That is a mistake.

Mr. JACKSON. I am informed that that statement is not correct.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is correct and the record shows it. Not only have some private pension bills been passed by the House riding over the committee's recommendations, but more private pension bills have become laws under the administration of President Cleveland than under any other President.

Mr. BRADY. I do not remember of any such bills, not more than one.

Mr. JACKSON. There may have been one or two cases.

Mr. McMILLIN. There are many.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask the gentleman to name one single bill that has passed through the House in opposition to the report of the committee.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; just give us one name.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman certainly can not be ignorant of the fact——

Mr. JACKSON. I think I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor and declines to yield to interruption.

Mr. JACKSON. I believe there has not been a minority report submitted to this House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I recollect of some cases that, by reason of the objections and obstructions to which I have before referred being placed in the way of their being passed on the Friday night sessions, were referred to a full House, and were passed by the House. There is another subject I wish to speak of. I have heard it said repeatedly on this floor, and, if I recollect aright, within the last forty-eight hours, that the people and soldiers were not asking more pension legislation. This, Mr. Speaker, is a very great mistake. What mean, then, the thousands and tens of thousands of petitions presented here to this Congress signed by both soldiers and citizens and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions? Did that committee not receive them? Does it not know there is such a demand? No other question has been petitioned for as this has. If any attention is given to petitions, this Congress ought to know that this legislation is demanded.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. I think in the few minutes we have for the consideration of this bill it is well to briefly notice the facts involved in this case. It is confessed in this veto message that this man was enlisted as a soldier for the defense of his country. It is admitted that while in camp waiting for assignment to duty he was, without provocation and without excuse, unlawfully assaulted, injured, and crippled; that those injuries pertained to and followed him to the present time; that in consequence of those injuries he is unable to sustain himself and to do the labor that under other circumstances he could perform. It is suggested as an excuse for this veto that the Government did not incite or authorize this assault, and that for that reason, although he was an enlisted man in the line of duty waiting for assignment to his regiment, he is not entitled now to recognition and protection at the hands of the nation. In other words, it is suggested that the Government does not insure its soldiers against any unlawful assaults and attacks and will not pension them when so injured.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a new doctrine it seems to me in pension legislation; and I challenge now the gentlemen on the other side of the House when they attempt to defend this veto message to produce a precedent to sustain them in this position. It has been the policy of this House, as it has been the policy of Congress, to pension every man who was injured and crippled in the line of duty if he was a loyal defender of his country and was injured or crippled without fault or wrong of his. If he was wounded in consequence of the accidental discharge of fire-arms held by himself or by comrades and was in the line of duty it has been the policy of the Government to pension him. If he was injured in consequence of a railroad accident while in the line of duty it has been the policy of the Government to pension him. If he was injured in any way not from his own carelessness, not from his own wrong or his own neglect, and was in the line of duty, it has been the policy of the Government to pension him and to recognize the obligation of the Government to him.

There was a man, as I have said, in the line of duty. There was a ruffian who assaulted him without excuse or provocation. And now the Chief Executive says, notwithstanding this man had his collar-bone broken, notwithstanding he had his ribs broken, notwithstanding he was injured to such an extent that from that time to this he has not been able to perform a day's labor or to enjoy the privileges of a well hour, yet because he was assaulted by a ruffian rather than a rebel soldier this Government will give to him no relief and will not heed his application and petition for a pension. Well may the veto message of this Executive be criticised! We have been charged in some of these messages with reckless and extravagant legislation, and men have come into this House who, before they have scarcely warmed their seats, have arraigned Congress for heinous extravagance and reckless legislation because it gives heed to the applications of the nation's poor and those who received injuries and wounds in the nation's service.

Mr. BURROWS. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. BURROWS. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MATSON. The merits of this particular case are not directly at issue under the motion to refer the message and accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But the case has been discussed to some extent, and it is insisted because the issue is not a complicated one therefore it ought to be decided at once. Upon that proposition I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, there is more involved in this case than the mere question as to whether or not a man who was in the line of duty and was injured without any fault on his part ought to be pensioned. That is not the whole of this case. There is a medical question as to whether or not the particular disability alleged by this man is the result of that injury, and that is certainly a matter that requires some investigation and some deliberation.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMES. Did not the Committee on Invalid Pensions pass on that matter, and was there any question about it?

Mr. MATSON. Perhaps we did pass upon this matter, but when the President of the United States, after his deliberation upon it, desires to present an objection founded upon that ground, it is only fair to the President for this House to stop and deliberate and try to ascertain whether or not he is right, or whether the House was right in its original action. The gentlemen upon the other side of the House are hasty about this matter. They seem to be very anxious to get at the President, for some reason or other; while we on this side of the House are determined that the President shall have fair play, and we intend to stand by that proposition.

It is not fair to the President to take up a case upon a hasty consideration and attempt to pass it over his veto. He has a constitutional right to exercise, the right to approve or disapprove the bills passed by Congress, and when he sees fit to disapprove a bill it is no more than respectful to him that this House should act deliberately and with all the information they can obtain upon the proposition, and not "jump in" hastily for the purpose of summarily passing the bill over his veto. That is the position of this House, and I want gentlemen upon the other side to understand it. So far as these vetoes are concerned, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] says there are sixty of them; forty-one altogether have been sent to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and two have been reported back. I think that at least a dozen of them have already been considered by the committee. As stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], who is a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, nearly all the time of the committee since those vetoes have been referred has been devoted to their consideration.

Now, upon the general proposition I have to say this: A large number of these bills are vetoed upon technical grounds, some because of a mistake in the name, some because the claimant has an application pending in the Pension Office that has never been rejected; some because the claims have been allowed in the Pension Office. There are not many of them in which there is any issue of fact between the President and the House, and of those we have already reported back two and asked the House to pass the bills notwithstanding the veto. The Committee on Invalid Pensions intends to give justice to these claimants, intends to examine carefully and deliberately into all the facts of each case in which the President has seen fit to interpose an objection—to re-examine the case; and the object of the motion I have made is to enable the committee to do that, so that it may be able to give the House better and more thorough information, if possible, than it has already done in these cases. We shall insist therefore, so far as I am concerned, and I believe this side of the House will insist, out of respect to the great office of the President of the United States, that these bills shall be given a careful reconsideration and that there shall be no hasty and disrespectful attempt to pass them over the vetoes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the prospect of these bills being reported back to the House within, say, the next fifteen days?

Mr. MATSON. So far as I am concerned, I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that when we fail to report a bill back it will be because we acquiesce in the judgment of the President and do not desire to trouble the House with it. The Speaker has already stated, in reply to an inquiry, the effect of the motion that I have made.

If any gentleman ascertains that his bill is not reported back by the committee or is not likely to be reported, it is his privilege at any time to move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and instruct them to report it back. Then, of course, if the judgment of the committee is against the bill, they will come in with an adverse report upon it, sustaining the veto. Therefore nobody is going to get hurt by these bills taking this course.

The whole matter is a matter of privilege and continues so, and if any gentleman feels that his bill is not being fairly treated by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, he can rise in his place and move, as a matter of privilege, to discharge the committee and instruct them to report back the bill. The object and purpose of the gentleman on the other side appear to be to hasten this matter, to attempt to prejudice the minds of the people against the President because of the fact that he has seen fit to differ with us in opinion about these bills, generally about small matters, in cases that are very close, and where a view either favorable or adverse may well be taken. In such cases the President has seen fit to take one view and we another, and the attempt to make a great issue out of this difference between the President and the House is ridiculous and absurd. These cases ought to stand upon their merits or fall upon their demerits.

There is a difference of opinion among members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions about some of these cases. There have been bills reported here favorably that some members of that committee think ought not to have been so reported, and there have been bills reported unfavorably that members of the committee believe ought to have been reported favorably. The members of the committee take different views of many of these bills, and the President, it appears, takes a different view from ours in relation to some of them. Now, that is all there is of this matter, and there is nothing in it to get excited about. The President of the United States has approved, I apprehend, ten, yes, fifteen, bills for every one that he has seen fit to disapprove, and, as I have already said, there is nothing in the whole matter for gentlemen to excite the country about.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true that the President has studiously refused to approve these pension bills, and has allowed them to become law by lapse of time?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no; he has signed them.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many has he signed?

Mr. MATSON. I know that the President has signed a great many of them. I know further, that he has stated, as the gentleman from Iowa suggests, that so many of these bills have been sent to him that he has not had time to examine them all.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true that a majority of the pension bills that have become law have become so without the President's signature?

Mr. MATSON. No. The majority have had his approval. The exceptions are those that have become law without his approval.

Mr. HEPBURN. I cite the President against the statement of the gentleman on that point.

Mr. MATSON. You can not show that the President has not signed the majority of these bills.

I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

Mr. BRAGG. There seems to be prevalent in this House an idea that it is the duty of the President to abdicate his office in favor of a majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that whenever in the exercise of the constitutional prerogatives given him he examines legislation to determine whether in his judgment that legislation is provident and wise, he has perpetrated an outrage upon the American people. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the President in this matter has acted in the honest discharge of his duty; and when, in the exercise of his judgment in the position which he occupies, he sends back legislation to this body without his approval, with his reasons, calling attention to such legislation, it is the duty of members here, if they act as legislators, to refer those reasons to the proper committee, that their correctness may be examined and a report made upon them to the House, upon which we may act, not in the excited, demagogical spirit of stump-speaking, but deliberately and judicially, and determine by our votes, as provided in the Constitution, whether in our judgment the reasons given by the President are sufficient to restrain the House from proceeding further in passing the particular bill to which the President files his objections.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that at last we have in the Executive Mansion a man who has the nerve and courage to place his hand upon legislation when he thinks it improper, whether it be pension legislation or railroad legislation. [Applause.] We have gone a great way, and in my judgment altogether too far, in this matter of pension legislation. There is a large class of soldiers for whom there is never a voice raised in this House. They are the men whom a confederate general had in his mind when he indorsed his approval upon an application for leave of absence that the soldier might go to see his family. He said "it was proper such men be permitted to go to their families, for from such men the nation breeds the soldiers who will defend it in the future." In speaking of this class of soldiers, I do not speak of those who were in the service merely fourteen days or sixty days or ninety days, and for whom many of your pension bills provide. But I mean that class of men who in April, May, June, and July, 1861, actuated only by patriotic desire to sustain the national flag, filled the ranks of your Army—a class of men but few of whom ever afterward joined it—the men who did not wait to be bought, but who entered the service from the pure dictate of duty, recognizing the fact that the Government had a right to its blood-tax from its citizens when its necessities demanded it, just as much as it had a right to tax their property for the support of the Government—those men who, if they survived three years' fighting, re-enlisted for three or five years more, or as long as the war might last. There is but a small band of them. They have no medals to commemorate their service; they have no recognition from the friends of the three months' soldiers.

This House, before it proceeds further in picking out the dead-wood, the trash, the men who followed in the wake of the Army and pensioning them, ought to make some provision for the men who fought at the front who have no hospital records, no such claims for pension as are ordinarily presented here. Some of those men I have the honor to know; and from one of this class I received a few days ago a letter which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, that it may go into the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

SOLDIERS' HOME, Hampton, Va., July 3, 1886.

GENERAL: I like your sentiments on the "business method of coining patriotism;" and chill penury having frozen out modesty, as well as all other softer virtues, I am bold enough to write to you to request a special favor which has no relation to "spot cash."

My discharges show that I enlisted on April 22, 1861, and was finally disbanded in November, 1865. During my re-enlistment service the rolls will show "bounty declined" in the column of remarks every time an installment was due, for I am an American, and would as soon take hire to resent a personal indignity as hire to defend my country. I took my wages which were my due, but I knew the State was entitled to the services and lives of any of its citizens whenever needed for its safety.

I am only one of many similar cases of the officers and men of the early Army who never took bounties or applied for any equalizations or arrearages or buncombe back-pay, and I think we deserve some record or recognition to show the youngsters growing up that there were men who fought for their flag alone, and not for their flag and so many dollars.

Couldn't Congress have a list made from the rolls in the A. G. O. and printed by authority? or couldn't they give those of us who are living a little nickel medal, something like the 2-cent one the Navy Department gives to sailors who risk their lives to save their shipmates from drowning? Those of us who are dead don't need any, as the recording angel has their record and will marshal them to front seats, which greenbacks can't purchase.

When the war was over I went to work and made my living as well as I could until some months ago, when infirmities compelled me to quit work and seek the shelter of the home which my country has provided for disabled soldiers. I am thankful for it, and don't propose to send in a bill besides for pensions, bounties, arrearages, back-pay, rations, clothing, or equalization, or anything else. It aint in the power of Congress to reduce me to the equality of a $1,300 patriot; but some things here look very strange, for instance: A small tobacco ration is allowed to non-pensioners, and it worries me to see brave old George H——, who saved our colors at Chantilly, marching in the line of paupers for his weekly dole, which he straightway shares with fellows who draw pensions for a valorous diarrhea or glorious piles—for many of our pensioners depend upon their hospital record rather than their Army record as claimants for their country's generosity.

Carl E——, here, has been twice commended in General Orders for gallantry in action and twice promoted specially, but he has no hospital record, no dashing rupture for awkwardly falling off a horse, no chivalric blindness from too much commissary whisky to show, and no brilliancy in his Army record will gain him a pension, though bent double by pains. Nothing but a neat hospital record or perjury will do it.

For myself (but I've blowed my own horn so much that I dislike starting a new tune) I will say that it is lucky for the Treasury that I can't sequently connect my present pains and aches and general usedupness with a bad cold I got sleeping in the snow among the Stafford Hills after our bloody repulse at Fredericksburg, or a certain thumping I remember under my ribs when I saw (twenty-three years ago to-day) Pickett's column advancing against the blazing crest of Round Top; but, in truth, though my most troublesome pain is in my pocket, I don't propose to soil my soul for any amount of dirty dollars.

If there is any acknowledgment can be made by Congress that we fought for our country without bounties, I for one will be very glad of it, and will always remain,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS MAY, of Maysville.

General BRAGG, Member of Congress.

[Applause.]

During the reading of the foregoing letter Mr. BRAGG'S time expired, when

Mr. MATSON said: I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes more.

The reading of the letter was then concluded.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what document this is?

Mr. BRAGG. It is a document which speaks the sentiments of such men as my friend from Indiana commanded during the war.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I thought it was a veto message from the President. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. The writer evidently does not approve of the course of Commissioner Black at all.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin inform us to what regiment or command the writer of that letter belonged?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not know. He was in the fight at Chantilly.

Mr. WEBER. Do you know him personally?

Mr. BRAGG. No; I do not. He must have been in Kearny's command.

Mr. WEBER. I think it would be interesting in this connection to know what he did during his service in the Army.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. BRAGG. I have but five minutes, otherwise I would be happy to answer any questions that might be propounded on the other side. I do not think any of these gentlemen can get me into what they might call a bad humor this morning. If they will give me all the time I want I will answer all the questions they may desire to put.

Mr. Speaker, the particular case under consideration is a case, as I see by casually glancing at the record, of a recruit who went into the service from Western or Southwestern New York very late in the year 1863. You all know about what recruits got in those days. He does not seem to have made application for pension for any disability contracted in the service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the gentleman for five minutes more.

Mr. MATSON. I yield for that time.

Mr. BRAGG. He does not seem to have made application on account of any disability contracted in the service. There appears no complaint of any disability from that fight he had in camp. He served all through the summer until his regiment was disbanded, having no disability, as appears from this record. This disability which actually disqualified him must have done so from the time, but it never crept out in application for pension until 1879, just before the arrearage act expired.

When the President calls our attention to these facts and asks us to stop before we strike, and to make further examination to find whether this quarrel was a drunken brawl, and whether it was a quarrel revived fifteen years after the war and brought to light to establish disability in an application for a pension when all other causes had failed, I say we ought honestly, irrespective of party passion and irrespective of any feeling of friendship or hostility to the President, to give this case a fair judicial consideration, and then vote for it on its merits irrespective of the President or any one else.

Mr. MATSON. I move the previous question on the pending motion and the amendment thereto.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the demand for the previous question inasmuch as the gentlemen who spoke on that side would not allow interruption. [Cries of "Vote!"] The other side will have the fairness, I hope, to permit a little further debate. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BURROWS. There can be no question a little time should be allowed on this side. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 54.

Mr. PERKINS. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MATSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is right; let us give them the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 103, not voting 75; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to withdraw my vote on the former roll-call, as I was paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to state that I was engaged in the committee-room when my name was called on both rolls. Had I been present I should have voted in the negative on this question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was in the Hall when the roll-call began, but before my name was reached was temporarily called out, and did not get back in time to answer. Had I been present I should have voted in the negative.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. WILSON with Mr. SAWYER, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. MATSON to refer the bill and message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 97, noes 26.

Mr. HOLMES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HOLMES and Mr. MATSON were appointed tellers.

Before the question was taken,

Mr. HOLMES (one of the tellers) said: In deference to the wishes of gentlemen on this side of the House I will withdraw the demand.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion of Mr. MATSON was agreed to.

H. L. KYLER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 1818, entitled "An act granting a pension to H. L. Kyler."

A pension was granted to the person named in this bill, dating from September, 1864, for neuralgia and disease of the eyes.

He was mustered into the service, to serve one hundred days, May 14, 1864, and mustered out September 8, 1864.

In 1880 information reached the Pension Bureau that the pensioner was treated for neuralgia and disease of the eyes at various times between the years 1859 and 1864, and this fact appearing to the satisfaction of the bureau upon the examination which followed, the pensioner's name was dropped from the roll.

Afterward another thorough examination of the case was made, when the pensioner was permitted to confront the witnesses against him and produce evidence in his own behalf.

It is claimed that a Dr. Saunders, who testified to treating the pensioner before his enlistment, was exceedingly unfriendly; but he was corroborated by his son and by entries on his books. Another physician, apparently disinterested, also testified to his treatment of the pensioner in 1860 for difficulties with his eyes and ears. The pensioner himself admitted that he had trouble with one of his eyes in 1890, but that he entirely recovered. Six other witnesses testified to the existence of disease of the pensioner's eyes before enlistment.

Though twelve neighbors of the pensioner testified that he was free from neuralgia and disease of the eyes before enlistment, I am of the opinion that the evidence against the pension was quite satisfactory, and that it should not be restored, as the bill before me proposes.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. CATHERINE M'CARTY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 5603, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine McCarty."

The beneficiary is the widow of John McCarty, of the First Missouri Regiment of State Militia Volunteers, who died at Clinton, Mo., April 8, 1864.

The widow filed her claim in 1866, alleging that her husband died while in the service from an overdose of colchicum.

The evidence shows without dispute that on the day previous to the death of the soldier a comrade procured some medicine from the regimental surgeon and asked McCarty to smell and taste it; that he did so, and shortly afterward became very sick, and died the next morning.

It is quite evident that the deceased soldier did more than taste this medicine.

Although it would be pleasant to aid the widow in this case, it is hardly fair to ask the Government to grant a pension for the freak or gross heedlessness and recklessness of this soldier.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move the following instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that said committee be and is hereby instructed to report the bill back to the House on or before Monday next.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, ti seems to me it would be treating with entire respect the Executive if we were to require the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report at least some of these cases back at a day not far distant. Certainly this ought to be done if these bills are to be considered at all during the present session of Congress.

I remember at an early date in the session, when a question of very grave concern to the soldiers of the Republic was pending before the House, I predicted that if it were left in the hands of the Committee on Invalid Pensions it would die in its pigeon-holes. I wish now to admit, in the presence of the House, that I was in error in that prediction; but although the committee reported the arrearages repeal back to the House it has died upon the Calendar, and will not be heard of again during this or perhaps the coming session of this Congress. I state now if these veto messages are all of them to be sent to this committee, and I do not reflect upon the committee, I respect it as highly as any other committee of the House, but if they are to be sent to that committee at this late date of the session it is the last that will be heard of them during this Congress.

I make that prediction. I know how difficult it will be for the chairman to secure even the attendance of a quorum of his committee during the remaining days of the session; and I am not surprised that it should be so, not only because members now are indifferent on the subject of these committee meetings, but for the additional reason that I do not presume that the majority side of this House will be in haste to report questions to this body that may involve questioning the wisdom of the veto of the Executive.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these discussions on the part of the President have proceeded on a wrong theory altogether. In all these messages, after the President has been duly facetious and has attempted to bring into disrepute these claims, criticized them, and cast, as far as it was possible, contumely on these applications, he has assumed that if the pension was properly rejected by the Pension Bureau under existing law this Congress may not give affirmative favorable legislation. That is a mistake. These private bills are of themselves the law of the particular case. It is not a question in these cases for Congress to determine whether or not under the general law the claimant is entitled to a pension. That is not the question. If he were entitled to relief under the general law the Pension Bureau is the place where he would secure his relief. There may be instances to be sure in which Congress sits as a kind of court of appeal to reverse the action of the Commissioner on the facts. There may be such cases; but in the main this Congress determines that in the particular case a pension ought to be given, not because it is covered by a general law, but because it is not covered by any general statute. It is because it has in itself equities that take it out of the general rule. It is because the facts of the case address themselves to the judgment and sympathy, if you please, of Congress. It is because in view of the circumstances it is the opinion of Congress that in the particular instance a pension ought to be granted.

Now, the President himself has recognized the propriety of this character of legislation. A bill was introduced by myself during this Congress where a family of old people adopted two infants, took them into their home at a tender age, raised them, educated them. They assumed the family name, and were understood by the neighbors to be the children, although they were not, of these aged people. The two boys went into the military service of the United States. One was killed in battle, the other contracted a disease from which he died after he returned. They were not the children of these people—only distantly related to them, but they had no parents living, and under the general law the Commissioner denied a pension—rightly, nobody questions it. Yet this House decided in that case as these boys sent a portion of their earnings to these old people and they were dependent upon them for support—this House decided to grant a pension; and the President—I presume after due consideration of all the facts—approved the bill.

Now was that proper? Is it competent for the Congress of the United States to set up its judgment in a particular case and pass on its merits considered alone? In this matter all I am asking now is that while we treat the Executive with entire respect, while we consider the reasons why he has rejected a particular case, let us have an opportunity of having these bills returned to the body of this House, of expressing our opinion, and of putting our reasons against the reasons of the Executive, and sending them, together with his vetoes, to the country, and let the country judge the issue between the people's representatives and the gentleman who sits at the other end of the Avenue and presumes to criticise our wisdom and our action. I take it that the Congress is as anxious to do right as the President. We are the immediate representatives of the people, and are as likely to reflect their views as he is. If they authorize these pension expenditures, as they are paid out of their taxes, the President may not complain. The responsibility of these measures may well be left to us.

There is a class of soldiers I want to allude to very briefly. I agree with some things said by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG]. There is an army of neglected men for whom I entertain the highest possible respect, I may say the highest possible veneration, a class of men, and a very large one, to whom more is due perhaps than to any other class of soldiers who went to face the cannon's mouth on the battlefields of the Repuplic. These are not known in any pension legislation in this or in any Congress. I mean the men who enlisted early, the men who fell in at the first tap of the drum, the men who began to march under the flag from the early days of 1861, who made the weary marches, who camped by the river sides, who unfolded their tents by the miasmatic swamps, the men who were in every possible battle, the men who were seldom sick, the men who were never in hospital, the men who never skulked, who were never captured. These men who fought it out from the beginning to the end, not being disabled, are not known on the pension-rolls of the country. Would to God that I could give every man of them a pension from this hour on to the last day of his life. [Applause.]

To these men more than to any others is due the honor of suppressing the rebellion and saving our civil institutions for posterity. To them a loyal people owe a debt they can never fully pay.

When I speak of my admiration for these men do not understand me as casting any reproach on the men who were disabled early in the fight. I remember an instance in which a comrade of mine left civil life, the peaceful fireside of his happy home, and a week afterward was shot down by my side on the battlefield, having served his country less than a week. Would any man dispute the fact that his wife and his children were entitled to a pension?

Men may in very short service have incurred disabilities that are pensionable. Thousands of well-authenticated cases of this kind have occurred. I am in favor of taking care of these men, putting them on the pension-roll, and rather than commit a mistake against a soldier I would commit one against the Government that he fought to save. [Applause on the Republican side.] To do otherwise would be rank injustice and base ingratitude.

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] to the fact that while he has spoken so disrespectfully and sarcastically of this class of short-service men who went into the Army late in the war, the gentleman himself, if I am not mistaken, has more than once in this House recorded his vote in favor of pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war. The gentleman shakes his head. If he means that he did not, let me congratulate him; but all the gentlemen who sit about him upon that side of the House and vote with him, all of them except, perhaps, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], voted to put on the pension-rolls of the Republic men who never heard the sound of a hostile gun, men who never left the camp or rendezvous, men who never saw a Mexican, living or dead. [Laughter.]

Yet the gentlemen who voted for that pension bill voted for it without reluctance, voted for it eagerly. Those gentlemen, when some unfortunate man has fallen in a war that amounts to something, in a real controversy, a war of four weary years, a war in which half a million of men on the Union side alone perished, a war that took hundreds of millions from the hard earnings of the people, a war that created a pension-roll that is to last for generations, a war that is still exacting millions every year from the men who work in the field and in the shop—when a man who tried to take his part in that war in a humble way, and who happened to be injured or killed accidentally rather than in the strict line of military duty—when such a case comes here for a pension they take another view. They not only deny him a pension, but ridicule him for having applied for one. Take, for example, the case of the unfortunate soldier in this particular case who took medicine that turned out to be poison and died, leaving a widowed wife and orphan children; when we propose to grant a pension in that case the Executive says: "No; I will sign your bill paying out tens of millions of the people's money to those soldiers of the Mexican war who were not wounded, who were not disabled, who never fought, but I will not sign this bill." And you gentlemen on the other side vociferously shout amen!

This unfortunate woman's husband died, it is true, in the service; she laid him, broken and bleeding, a willing sacrifice upon the altar of his country; she and her children have lost their protector; but, says the President, I can not allow the Congress of the United States to give that poor woman and her children a pension, because the soldier did not meet his death strictly in the line of military duty." May God have mercy upon a man who has a heart like that! ["Amen" on the Republican side.] I think if such a heart belonged to an ordinary man it would be so withered and hardened that the people could, in imagination at least, hear it rattle against its owner's ribs as he walks along the streets. That is all there is in this case. I admit that upon a strict construction of the law this man did not die in the line of military duty; but suppose a comrade had accidentally discharged a musket and killed him, that would not have been any more in the line of military duty; yet who would deny the widow a pension?

Hundreds of instances of the kind have gone through the Pension Office, as they have gone through the Congress of the United States. What difference is there in being shot by accident and poisoned by accident? It is hard to draw the exact line of military duty in all cases. I appeal to gentlemen who have been in the military service if this be not true; and I regret exceedingly that I am here raising a question of military law with that distinguished soldier who is Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States! [Laughter on the Republican side.] He has probably, by reason of his position, seen longer service and better service than I have. I judge so from the manner in which he treats his comrades who suffered with him. I apprehend that the only trouble with his excellency was that which afflicted—shall I say it?

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. Say it!

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I speak with all respect, I will not apply it personally, but there is a class of gentlemen who are criticising these applications for pensions because they have been long delayed, or because the soldier served only a short time—gentlemen who never were in the service themselves. I have respect for the man who tried to serve his country, who went in and did his best, even if he turned so very a coward that he could not do well; but as to these gentlemen who staid out of the service and who now criticise these applicants for pensions so severely, I apprehend the trouble with them was that which afflicted the soldiers of Prince Hal: Nobody doubts their courage; there was but one thing in the world of which they were afraid, and that was danger. [Laughter.] So they never went to the front but kept themselves safe at home, and now they grow very valorous when they stand armed cap-a-pie with vetoes between these unfortunate men and the Treasury of the United States. The people are not demanding this exercise of economy on the part of the Executive. I know of no such demand coming up here from the men who pay their hard earnings into the Treasury. I know many men who did not serve in the Army. I have a large constituency, embracing some who did not like the war very well; but I know none of them who begrudges the pittance that the Congress of the United States has been giving to these men in the shape of these private pension bills.

The President has already vetoed ninety-eight of these bills. If he should happen to veto eleven more he will have vetoed in the short period of sixty days more acts of the American Congress than all his predecessors have vetoed; and he will go down to posterity as the great American objector, and will rob one of my colleagues of the laurels he has been so long and arduously laboring to earn. [Applause.]

I now yield ten minutes to my friend from Iowa [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I object to referring this bill again to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. There is certainly no reason under heaven why it should go back to that committee. There is no matter of fact to be discovered. The veto of the President and the report which was previously filed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions agree exactly as to the facts in this case; and to show this, I desire to have the Clerk read that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 5603):

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5603) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine McCarty, beg leave to report:

That Catherine McCarty is the widow of John McCarty, late a private of Company B, First Missouri State Militia Volunteers, who enlisted February 5, 1862, and died at Clinton, Mo., April 8, 1864, while in the service, under the following distressing circumstances, as testified to by comrades S. Black, R. Carter, J. R. Rhoades, and W. H. Cole, in the following joint affidavit:

"Thomas Collen, a member of company, got some medicine from the surgeon and came in smelling and tasting of it, and asked John McCarty, who was nearest him, to smell and taste it, as it had a peculiar smell and taste; said McCarty did so, and shortly afterward got very sick and commenced vomiting, and died the next morning in great agony."

This is confirmed by records now on file in the War Department and by affidavit of J. G. Hart, late surgeon of soldier's regiment, who testifies that McCarty while on duty in the service at Clinton, Mo., took some medicine (fluid extract of colchicum, which had been prescribed for another soldier) through a mistake, and died about thirty hours thereafter.

His widow filed application for pension, which was rejected on the ground that "the soldier's death was caused by his taking poison, not the result of any disease contracted in the military service." The Pension Office, under the law, could not have done otherwise, but Congress can, and your committee believe should recognize the fact that this woman had given her husband and the father of her children to the service of her country, and that while so serving his country he lost his life. It is true it was by a careless accident, but yet one that under the peculiar circumstances might have happened to any one.

He served his Government faithfully for nearly two years; he left a widow with four children, to fight life's battles alone; she is now old and very poor, and, in view of the services rendered by her husband, richly deserves the small recompense of a widow's pension during her few remaining years; wherefore we recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the only question at issue in this case seems to arise upon the position taken by the President that the widow of no soldier should receive a pension unless he was killed in battle or died in the service as a direct result of injuries received technically in the line of his duty.

Here is the case of a man who enlisted less than a year after the commencement of the war and served two full years. One day when he and his comrades were sitting in a tent another comrade came in with a bottle of medicine, and without a suggestion from this soldier asked him to smell and taste it. He did smell and taste it then and there; and before the next morning he was dead. He left a widow with four children. This widow comes to this Government and says that her husband gave two full years of active and valiant service in defense of his country and its flag, that by a simple accident, which might have happened perhaps to any curious gentleman, even to gentlemen on this floor, her husband lost his life while in the service of his country, and in consequence she has for years been asking from the Government the poor pittance of $8 or $12 a month.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] asks me where the soldier got the medicine. Another soldier obtained the medicine from the physician of the regiment, who prescribed it. The soldier who obtained it intended to use it for himself or a sick comrade.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions has examined this case critically and conscientiously, as it has every case that has been before it. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say here and now that as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I have given to the discharge of my duties upon that committee my best ability and most earnest endeavors; and I have never yet joined in recommending to this House a single case which I did not believe was meritorious, nor one that I think this House should hesitate to pass over the President's veto.

Now what is the objection of the President to these pension cases which have been sent to him? I fail to find in many of them any reasonable objection. He seems to have taken occasion in many of these cases to read a lecture to this House—to throw slurs upon the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who have examined and reported upon these bills with more fairness and care than it has been possible for the President to exercise. Why, Mr. Speaker, the President does not examine these cases. When these bills are sent to him he sends a messenger to the Pension Office for the report in these cases. Possibly some clerk in that office, who made out the report when the cases were heretofore rejected, sends him a copy of the same report, and the President sends that report here with the addition of his sarcasm and slurs upon Congress and his insults to the Union soldiers, for whom or for whose relatives these pensions are asked.

Mr. Speaker, it is said on the other side of the House—and it has been frequently thrown up to us at our Friday night sessions when we have had these matters under consideration—that there is a great clamor in the land against this pension legislation. Gentlemen on the other side tell us that by this wholesale pension business, as they call it, we are going to bring the whole pension system into disrepute; and in the next breath they tell us that we are simply, in passing these bills, endeavoring to purchase the soldier vote. I, for one, Mr. Speaker, resent such a charge as that, and shall continue to resent it on my own behalf and on behalf of all the intelligent soldiers of this land. As these bills are submitted to me for consideration, I shall continue, where I find merit in them, to report them favorably.

Mr. Speaker, whence comes the opposition to this pension legislation? It comes from the other side of this House. It has always come from that side. Go back a comparatively few years to the commencement of this pension legislation and see who voted against the original arrears act? Sixty-six Democrats, and not one Republican. Who voted against the modified arrears act? Sixty-one Democrats, and but one single Republican. Who, in the beginning of this session, voted against the addition of $4 a month to the widows' pensions? Sixty-six Democrats and not one solitary Republican. Who is it that obstructs legislation at our Friday night sessions? Who is it that calls for a quorum and defeats the consideration of these meritorious bills? Democrats always, and never, thank God, a Republican. [Applause on the Republican side.] Who is it, Mr. Speaker, that vetoes these meritorious pension bills? A Democratic President; for never has a Republican President sent to Congress a message vetoing a bill of this character. Mr. Speaker, I want this House to understand, and I want the country to understand, that the Republicans are responsible for this pension legislation; and every one of them here is willing to shoulder his full share of that responsibility.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I am correctly informed all the Presidents of the United States before the one we now have vetoed but one pension bill. No man among them all in the whole previous history of this country had the courage to deny to the widows, or the orphan children, or to the crippled soldiers, or dependent parents of such soldiers pension until we got our present President. He stands out in the history of our country a conspicuous example of a disposition, a taste, a temerity, a partisanship which is unexampled.

To my mind the Democratic members of the House of Representatives have had their political manhood put to the severest test right here. By the majority of their committee, with the Republicans on that committee co-operating with them, these pension bills were unanimously reported to the House and passed. Only one or two or three men on that side of the House offered obstruction to this legislation. We found Democrats from the North and Democrats from the South voting for these bills. The bills were passed by an almost unanimous vote. They were unanimously reported by a committee at the head of which stands an honorable Democratic soldier of the Republic, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]. They received the close scrutiny and careful investigation of the committee of which he is chairman. That committee rejected many of the cases presented to it and reported favorably only such as it was well satisfied deserved the approval of the House.

Mr. BRADY. They rejected more than they passed.

Mr. BAYNE. I am informed they rejected more than they passed.

Mr. CONGER. Twice as many as they passed.

Mr. BAYNE. I am told by another member of the committee they rejected twice as many as they passed.

Having given these bills that close examination and reported them to the House, having passed them by an almost unanimous vote, I say the members on this floor who stand by the vetoes of the President have their manhood subjected to a severe strain.

The President has chosen to take the present law in regard to pensions as a sort of constitution, and if bills fall within the meaning of that law they ought to be passed, but if they are outside of that law then they should not be passed. Why should the President assume a position of that kind? Has not Congress the power to pension the widow of a dead soldier or his dependent parents, whether entitled to a pension under the existing law or not?

As was said by my friend from Indiana [General BROWNE] a few moments ago, a bill was passed in the House granting a service pension to all men who enlisted in the Mexican war, some of whom never left their rendezvous, some of whom never heard a gun fired or saw a Mexican soldier on the other side. It is not denied we have power to pass bills to pension soldiers of the Republic, although they may not fall within the letter, or even within the equities of the existing law. Why should it be denied?

But it was intimated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that those who are now asking for pensions and those who are dead whose widows are now applying for pensions were not of the class who rendered faithful, long, and efficient service. I regret to say I think my friend from Indiana [General BROWNE] to some extent sustained that proposition in the line of his remarks. I am sure, however, he did not mean it. I say the men who are applying for these pensions as a rule were men who entered the service at the beginning of the war and fought to the conclusion of that war. I say that the men who are the last to apply for Government bounty are often the men who decline to ask for it until their necessities force it upon them.

Why, sir, the President vetoed a bill granting a pension to Sarah Harbaugh, of Allegheny, Pa. She was a widow of a soldier who entered the Army in 1861 and fought all through the war until 1864, when his three years of enlistment expired. She was left without means, with five children dependent upon her and infirm herself from physical disability. During a period of three years her husband had made an honorable record as a brave and gallant soldier, and he died, as is believed, from disease contracted in the service. The President, by his veto, now says this brave soldier's widow with her five children shall not have enough to live on—that she shall not have what this bill proposes to give her. No man can excuse, much less justify, the veto of such a pension bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvana [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, Catherine McCarty is the widow of John McCarty, late a private in Company B, First Missouri State Volunteers, who enlisted on the 5th of February, 1862, and died on the 8th of April, 1864. She has come to Congress asking for a pension on account of the death of her husband. That he came to his death while in the service of his country no one denies. That he died from the effects of medicine is uncertain. Whether he died from that cause or from an attack of some disease does not appear affirmatively in the case, nor at all except by inference. He may have died from taking the medicine, or he may have died from any one of a hundred other causes which are not named in the report. From all the evidence it is certain that he died, and died while in the service.

Having established these facts, I think, sir, this widow had a right to rest her case in confidence with the Congress and the President. I doubt if a single day passed after our Army was fairly in the field that did not chronicle the loss of some good and true life by mishap or by accident. If it did not come within our own observation we were wont to read in the newspapers that Private So-and-so was "killed by the accidental discharge of his own gun," or that "a soldier was found dead in his camp this morning, and the cause of his death can not be ascertained."

I had a comrade in arms myself who in 1862 was examining, with others, a revolver that was brought into camp for sale, with a view of purchasing it, so that he might be better equipped to defend himself against the enemies of the flag. By mishap the pistol was discharged, the shot entering his vitals, from the effects of which he died, and died as clearly in the service of his country and in the line of his duty as if killed in battle. So did this man in the present case. If the heirs of a soldier who is accidentally shot are entitled to a pension, I claim that this man's widow is also. He did not take the medicine referred to by the committee and the President for the purpose of killing himself. There is no evidence of a purpose to commit suicide.

It was procured by a comrade and offered to McCarty, who simply tasted it at his comrade's request. Now if that comrade had malice in his heart and gave to McCarty medicine for the purpose of killing him, of which there is no evidence, certainly that does not show, what the President intimates, that there was a purpose here to commit suicide. To my mind it is straining a point a good deal to assume that death resulted from tasting the very same medicine that his comrade tasted without injury—at least so far as the testimony shows. But suppose it was medicine that killed this soldier, does it help the widow any to say that her darling husband died from the use of too much medicine while in the service, rather than from the loss of too much blood spilled in battle. Sir, this excuse for withholding the President's signature from the pension bill of Catharine McCarty is to my mind most unsatisfactory.

This man, I repeat, died in the service. He had served his country, as the record shows, well and truly for more than two years, and every hour from the date of his enlistment until death ended his patriotic career he was in the line of duty as a soldier. A soldier wasting in the hospital from disease or suffering from wounds is as much in the line of duty as when charging the enemy's strongest line of battle. It is, alas, the unvarying history of every war that more men die from accident and disease than are killed by the enemy in battle.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions say in their report, after investigating the case—and they have investigated it more thoroughly than the President could have done; they have been investigating all such cases from the beginning of the session up to this hour, while the President has been investigating them only for the last fifteen or twenty days—that committee says that this widow is entitled to a pension. She is getting old. She is poor; the years hang heavy upon her. In her adversity she holds out her hands toward the great Republic and pleads for the relief a nation like ours can easily give. The committee have examined the case. The Congress has read the story of John McCarty, how he left his Catherine in the day of her beauty and devotion and marched away under the flag—"for three years or during the war;" how, notwithstanding privation and suffering, he for two long years was with his regiment, in the long marches and in the great shock of battle, and then he died—died on the tented field, within the sound of his commander's voice and on that very day ready for "marching orders." The committee is content; the Congress is satisfied, and the bill is passed and goes to the President. Will he hear the widow's cry? No! The commander-in-chief of our "piping time of peace" is troubled about the manner of McCarty's "taking off." At once the patriot soldier is changed by executive imagination to such a knave that, for the sake of cheating the Government out of the services he had volunteered to give, he takes a deadly poison and ends his heroic career. A glorious opportunity, says the Executive, is this for another veto. It has been written. It is here. And now we are "deliberating in cold debate" whether we shall yield to Presidential dignity or do a Representative's duty.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions is a very conservative committee. Out of the whole number of six bills that I have myself introduced since the first week of the session—and I introduced ten prior to that time or during the first week we were permitted to introduce bills—out of this whole number of six there has not been a single favorable report, while, in my opinion, there should have been a favorable report in every one of them. There is not a single one but shows affirmatively that the soldier, the widows, or the dependent parents, as the case may be, are at the present time in need, and sorely in need. In my judgment this is reason enough always for passing a private pension bill: Is the soldier who served his country in the day of her peril, or those who were dependent upon him, now in need in consequence of that service? When such a case is presented I will vote for it so long as my people give me a place in the Congress, though every other member vote against me. I never have been and I never will be deterred from present duty because some one cries, "Hold on until all the needy can be served alike." I know of no time so apt for the granting of relief to the widow and the fatherless as that which is offered when they come hungry and needy into my presence.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman claim that no bills have been reported favorably from that committee of those that he has himself introduced?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; that is not what I said; but I did say that out of the whole number of those introduced by me since the first week of the session none have been reported favorably. I had favorable reports on some of the bills introduced prior to that time. But I do not complain of the treatment of the committee in reporting against my bills. I have no complaint here now, and only refer to it as a fact in support of the assertion that the committee has been very conservative and in my opinion have not reported a single case that has passed the House that was not based on affirmative testimony which fully established its merits. I have regretted, of course, that the committee have reported favorably so few of my bills, but I am not speaking of these facts to complain of the committee, but rather to show how little ground there is for the President to lecture this committee or the Congress.

Again, take the case of Edward M. Harrington, the one just referred to the Pension Committee. A little examination will show that the President's veto is most unjust in the language employed. Harrington had enlisted, and while waiting orders to proceed to his regiment, and while in the barracks at Dunkirk, he was knocked down, badly pounded, kicked, and robbed. Although he was, after partial recovery, sent forward to his regiment, he never recovered from the injury. Several of his ribs and his collar-bone were broken and his head badly bruised. There is not a doubt that to this day Harrington is a sufferer from the assault made upon him while a soldier and in line of his duty. There is not a word of testimony in the case which fixes any blame upon Harrington for the assault, and yet the President goes outside of the record to say:

> The Government ought not to be called upon to insure against the quarrelsome propensities of its soldiers, nor to compensate one who is worsted in a fight, &c.

There is not a scrap of testimony in the case from which it can be inferred that Harrington was a man of "quarrelsome propensities" or that he ever engaged in "a fight" with his assailant—or any one else. The claim was rejected in the Pension Department for the reason that the general law was believed not to cover the case. That Congress has the right to pass a law covering this particular case does not admit of a doubt, and that it was justified by the facts in doing so is just as free from doubt. That the case should have been vetoed can be accounted for on no other ground than that the President either misunderstood the case or his prejudice against the soldier has driven him upon untenable ground.

The attempt at sarcasm and ridicule upon the ills that affected Andrew J. Wilson, late of Company F, Ninety-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, is less effective in support of the President's veto than it is unjust to the soldier. He says:

> Whatever else may be said of this claimant during his short military career, it must be conceded that he accumulated a great deal of disability.

It appears from the evidence that this soldier had poor eyesight and was troubled somewhat with deafness before he was drafted. These ailments he made known to the examining surgeon and claimed exemption from military service on account of their existence. The surgeon, however, disregarded his plea, pronounced him "sound enough for a soldier," and he was accepted by the Government. In his application for a pension he did not claim for loss of eyesight or hearing, but set forth that he had contracted rheumatism, disease of the kidneys, and rupture. Each of these afflictions he proves to have existed in the Army and explains fully how they were brought on, the former from sleeping on the ground without rubber blankets and the latter by the giving way of a flight of stairs up which he and several of his comrades were ascending. That a soldier should contract rheumatism and kidney disease from sleeping unprotected upon the ground is less surprising than that he should escape either of them; and that one should become ruptured in military service is not a thing to excite wonder, at least to those who have studied the effects of that rough life and remember that, including cavalrymen, more than one-eighth of all who are discharged from military service are afflicted with hernia.

In several of his vetoes the President, it seems, would have it appear that the Congress is engaged in the work of pensioning deserters. Now it is true that Congress has passed a few bills where the company rolls show the soldier as a deserter, but I know of no case where a bill granting a pension has passed either House when it was believed the charge was properly and justly made. In my opinion it is the duty of Congress to correct an unjust record against a soldier, and when he is entitled to it see that he is granted the pension he would have received had not the record wronged him. Nothing was more common than to find upon the records of almost any company names of soldiers marked as deserters. Corrections were constantly being made upon explanation or after-discovered evidence, but in thousands of instances throughout the Army the correction was never made, sometimes because the officer making the entry died or was taken prisoner before the opportunity came, and sometimes because the soldier affected was himself in prison until all chance to explain had passed forever. The record once made, and filed in the War Department, nothing but an act of Congress by general or special law can change it. I have in mind now two cases in which the President's vetoes have, as it appears to me, charged the soldiers referred to most unjustly in the matter of desertion, and at the same time made it the ground for withholding his signature to the bills for their relief.

The report in the first case to which I shall refer was made by my painstaking and faithful colleague, Dr. SWOPE. As presented in the veto message it appears like an extremely weak case. It is the bill for the relief of Julia Connally, widow of Thomas Connally. The evidence shows clearly that at the date when the entry of desertion was made the soldier had been dead at least ten days. His regiment being in camp at Harrisburg, Pa., he went on a visit to his family, and, failing to return, he was, on or near the day he should have been in camp, marked upon his company rolls "a deserter." It was subsequently learned at a post mortem examination that the soldier was found dead in the canal; that he left his home the day before his furlough expired, taking passage on a canal-boat. His starting on his return before his furlough expired was sworn to by his wife, and, in addition, a furlough was found in one of his coat pockets. Had all these things come to the knowledge of the captain of his company the record would have doubtless been corrected. Whether the neglect to amend the record is chargeable to the carelessness of some one or to the exigencies of military service matters little—the fact remains that the records do not speak the truth.

The other case to which I will refer is that of George W. Tiller, of Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteers, who enlisted on October 8, 1861, and died in Andersonville, July 21, 1864. There was entered on the 20th day of September, 1863, opposite his name the word "deserted." The next heard of him is that he was admitted to the Andersonville hospital and died the same day. The bare statement that this soldier died at Andersonville precludes every possibility of doubt upon the question of bad faith toward his Government. Deserters from the Union ranks in the late war were not wont to push for Andersonville when they desired to shirk military duty. Many a Union soldier has risked his life to break out of that charnel-house, but until this case was presented I never heard it intimated that any soldier ever broke into it. Aside from the absurdity of the inference, it appears from the testimony that Wheeler's cavalry was in September and October, 1863, raiding in the part of Alabama where this regiment was stationed, and that several members of the Twenty-eighth Kentucky were captured and that one of the number at least besides Tiller, a John W. B. Shirley, was sent to Andersonville March 7, 1864, admitted to the Andersonville hospital May 10, 1864, and died June 14, 1864, only thirty-seven days before Tiller died, at precisely the same place.

In the light of all these facts is it not presuming too much to assume that Tiller is in any just sense a deserter? Yet true it is that in both these cases the President refers to the soldiers as being deserters, and in such a manner as to lead us to believe that in his mind there is no doubt of it.

I have referred to these cases somewhat in detail because, sir, I think it is proper the country should know upon what flimsy pretexts the defenders of the Union are refused pensions by the nation's Executive. I do not assert that every one of the one hundred cases, more or less, which have been vetoed present as strong grounds in their favor as these, but a majority of them do, and many of them are even more meritorious.

Running through all these vetoes is the theory that Congress should relieve only where the cases fall within the provisions of existing law. The President's vetoes are replete with expressions like this:

> I am of the opinion that a correct conclusion was reached in this case at the Pension Department.

This theory establishes too much, for if correct then all private pension bills should be vetoed, except when the Pension Department has not, in the opinion of the President, reached a correct conclusion under the general law or has blundered concerning the facts; that is, the legislative and executive branches of the Government become, according to this theory, a court of appeal or of last resort wherein the laws are construed and the facts properly unraveled.

But there is another very common error into which, it seems to me, the President has fallen in considering these pension cases. He has in a very large number of his vetoes taken the position that a delay on the part of the soldier to apply for a pension is good ground for its refusal. To my mind such delay does not in the least weaken a case; because for many years a soldier has braved his misfortunes and worked his own way in the world without help from the Government, when he might have secured it, should militate in his favor rather than against him, and the case should stand upon its merits without reference to date of application. Now, sir, what means this war all along the line upon the Union soldier? Are we really making the history that the Republican orators foretold as sure to come if the Democracy should come into power?

I have many times heard the stump orators stoutly maintain that the rights of the Union soldier would be as little regarded when the Democracy secured the reins of Government as are the rights of suffrage of colored men in the hands of their former masters. Are the President and the majority, who now seem determined to support him, making good the charge by practical demonstration? I will only refer to facts and let the people judge. Let us see if the head of the party has not simply given the signal by these vetoes, and if the rank and file are not becoming most obedient followers. The House of Representatives, by its majority, on the 22d of June introduced, through its leader [Mr. MORRISON] a resolution which practically says that in all future legislation in behalf of the soldier—

> We will vote for pensions provided you will take upon yourselves the odium of collecting a tax to pay them. All other obligations will be met, in the future as in the past, out of the general Treasury, but if you get your pensions you must do so by capturing the consciences and opening the pockets of the rich men who have great incomes.

What an enviable position is this in which to place the defenders of the nation's life! Is there any doubt upon this point? That I may not in the least misstate the position of the party I will quote what Democratic leaders said in that debate. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], chairman of the Committee on Pensions, was the first one on the Democratic side to admit what all must have understood from the start. He says, on page 6365 of the RECORD:

> This proposition is simply to establish a fund and dedicate it sacredly to the payment of the soldiers' pensions. Ah, gentlemen, the trouble is that you are afraid of a special tax upon incomes of the wealthy. * * * I will be frank with you, gentlemen, I am in favor of reducing tariff taxes * * * but at the same time I am in favor of paying the pensions of the soldier * * * but I want that expenditure levied upon the wealth of the country, upon the men who got rich while the soldiers were fighting the battles. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said, pages 6365 and 6366:

> This is the principle underlying this proposition to appropriate out of the internal-revenue or income tax by which the pensions shall be assured that their annual income will come to them with as much certainty as the bondholders.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, said, page 6373:

> What shall it be, a temporary income tax upon accumulated wealth (to meet these pensions) * * * or a tax which the laborers of the country * * * must largely pay.

This discussion was not on a proposition to levy an income tax, as these remarks and others would seem to indicate; it was a proposition to allow pension legislation only when provision is made for pensioners to get their pay out of certain taxes—to be levied on the passage of each pension bill. If these gentlemen are anxious to levy an income tax, being in the majority, why do they not bring in a bill for that purpose? Ah, sir, that is not what they want. They want to defeat any further legislation in behalf of soldiers. The Democracy are now engaged in the task of making the soldier odious. Think of it, what chance the soldier would have in continuing such a fund, even if it could be established. That tax was one of the first war taxes to be repealed, even when laid for general purposes. Lay such a tax for a specific purpose and how long would it remain? The soldier for whose benefit it is paid would become an object of hatred and contempt to those compelled to bear its burdens, at once. Against him would be arrayed in an hour all the leading newspapers paying an income tax, all corporate power coming within the provisions of such a law; all the leading importers, manufacturers, and merchants; all the great bond and mortgage holders, banking institutions, and syndicates; all the great landlords, cattle-kings, oil-princes, and all the fortunate and favored of the whole land who live upon the earnings and fortunes of their ancestry.

These combined forces of wealth are often charged with shaping the policy and controlling the legislation of the country even against the will of the great body of the middle and lower classes, constituting at least forty millions of people. And yet this chivalric Democracy, instead of levying an income tax, if needed, in a manly way as a mandate of the whole people and for the whole people, would impose upon the defenders of the flag, now not more than three hundred thousand strong, the alternative of forcing from combined wealth a fund for pensions, or finish their journey to the grave neglected and forgotten by the country their blood has sanctified and their valor saved!

During the past two months instances have been numerous of a conspicuous purpose on the part of the Democracy to suppress all pension legislation whatsoever. Plenty of bills have been reported and placed on the Calendar, where they are successfully kept to the rear by the skillful manipulation of the majority leaders. The restoration of arrearages, the Blair bill, granting to Union soldiers no more than you have been swift to vote to the Mexican soldiery; bill No. 1886, which grants pensions to soldiers in need whether physically incapacitated or not, each meritorious and none of which you dare meet by a square vote, yet you have succeeded, you still succeed, in keeping them beyond the reach of the minority. This I have no doubt you will continue to do until the long session ends, unless you can bring them out harnessed to some absurd proposition like your resolution of the 22d of June to which I have referred.

You talk of what you have done in the past (always, be it said, with a minority of your own party and a solid Republican vote), and you attempt to justify your do-nothing policy of the present, because you assume all this legislation should have been disposed of when we were in power immediately after the war, when we were struggling to meet national obligations, and when the soldier, then in the prime of life, was not pressing his necessities upon us. You make great ado about the number of pension bills signed by the present Executive as compared with those signed by former Presidents, at a time when few private bills came here for the reason they were still pending in the Pension Department, and because it was not then known they would be rejected there. Each Friday evening recently when these bills are being considered you have had your pickets out in the person of some of your most noted and bitter opponent of the soldier, who either "talks to death" or "calls a quorum" upon every bill which does not meet his "unbiased judgment." His speeches are always headed with precisely the same exordium, and consists of vehement protestations of his undying devotion for the soldier and a purpose to "stand by him in all proper cases," while the balance of his speeches is devoted to allegations of fraud and intrigue running through all cases in general and none in particular.

These pickets on the new line of Democratic belligerency have, since the appearance of vetoes, become more bold and vigorous, and they taunt us with the assurance that their course is approved by the President.

Only recently have I abandoned all hope that the Democracy could not be united in opposition to this class of legislation. I now confess my mistake. These pickets and the President have got the party under proper discipline, and here we are filibustering for a whole day, near the close of the session, to prevent a worthy widow from securing her pension of $12 a month, all because the President of the United States tells us that her husband did not come to his end in a manner that comports with his present views of heroic dying. I believe that the President is in general far in advance of his party in sincerity of purpose to work out all needed reforms and in the determination to make an honorable record for his party and the country, but upon this question he has certainly taken a course that is unjust to the nation's defenders, and, unfortunately, he finds more ready following from his party than when he pursues a course entirely defensible.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States in the performance of its duty has passed certain bills to pension soldiers in the late war. They went to the President for his approval, and in the performance of his duty, as he conceived it to be, they are returned with his reasons for his failure to approve them. One of these bills is now before the House for consideration, several I believe having been already considered this morning and referred to the committee, and I am told that there are more to follow. While I concede to the President the right and power to return a bill with his objections, yet he is entitled to no more consideration than we are. He no more acts under oath than did the Committee on Invalid Pensions when it unanimously and favorably reported this bill and the other preceding it that have been vetoed by the President. He is entitled to as much consideration and no more than that committee or this House; and while I shall not abuse him personally, yet I shall, if I can, find out the real motive that prompts these vetoes.

Of course, if any of these applicants for pension could be relieved under the general law they would not be here asking relief. If their cases come within the general law they would not appeal to the heart of the country, the justice of the country, and the humanity of the country, as represented in Congress, for special or for general legislation.

These vetoed cases while not precisely equal in merit, yet are substantially similar all along the line. So I might just as well speak of one as of another. But before I speak specifically of one case let me say to my mind all these vetoes tell one story, namely: That the President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional prerogatives has, in effect, determined that while he is President there shall be no further pension legislation. If he will not approve these special bills to pension individual soldiers who are equitably entitled to relief—their cases not coming within the strict letter of the general law—of course he would not approve the general pension bill which passed the Senate and is now pending in this Democratic House even if the House should pass it, which bill provides, in substance, that every soldier of the late war who is now disabled and dependent on his own labor for support shall be pensioned.

We gave the soldiers of the Revolutionary war and of the war of 1812 service pensions, and in due time will give a service pension to the soldiers of the late war. In the mean time there are cases not covered by the general law where the soldier is disabled in which there is a present equity for relief, and it is because of such equity Congress has sought to give relief case by case.

Take the case that just preceded this one, that of Edward M. Harrington. I hold in my hand the President's veto. Gentlemen are familiar with the facts in the case. Here is the report. It appears the man was mustered into the service of the United States, and without fault upon his part, while he was in the service, in the line of his duty, another man, not a confederate, but as bad as a confederate, yes, worse than a confederate, made an attack upon him for the purpose of robbing him. He broke his ribs; he broke his collar-bone. Well, now, it is fair to presume that if this man had not enlisted in the service of his country he would not have been subjected to that kind of attack. Here is what is said by the Army surgeon in his certificate of disability for discharge, that the man was discharged on the ground of—

> Epilepsy, produced while in the service of the United States by blows of violence over the right hypochondrium, producing a deformity of the sternum; disability three-fourths; not fit for the Invalid Corps.

This is signed by H. McG. Wilson, assistant surgeon. And here comes another physician, who testifies that the assault was altogether without provocation on the part of this man, its object being robbery. Here is another, who says the soldier's brain has become greatly impaired, preventing him from engaging in business. That is the case we sent to the President, and which the President has returned with a veto.

Ah, said the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], who was quick after making his speech to cut off reply by applying the gag of the previous question, it may be the epilepsy was not traceable to the injury. The President does not make that point. In your haste to excuse the President after you have made this unanimous report and we passed the bill, the gentleman from Indiana makes a defense which it appears to me stultifies gentlemen on that side, a defense which the President did not make. What does the President say? He says:

> It is hardly worth while considering the character of these alleged injuries or their connection with the fits with which the claimant is afflicted.

He does not consider that at all, but puts the veto on this ground:

> The Government ought not to be called upon to insure against the quarrelsome propensities of its individual soldiers nor to compensate one who is worsted in a fight.

However correct that position may be, that is not this case. He continues:

> Or even in an unprovoked attack.

That is this case.

There is your veto. For one man I join issue with the President. This man in the line of duty was attacked by a would-be robber, and without fault upon his part, and contracted epilepsy from the injuries he received. It is plainly proven that his mind is impaired. Poor in pocket, with both mind and body impaired from epilepsy contracted in that service, he comes knocking at the doors of Congress for a pension, and the President says "No." I say yes. Do you gentlemen on the other side dare say no? It looks as if you were going to dodge these cases. They have been referred, case after case, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions instead of being promptly voted upon. This precise case with the facts that have been established you referred after two roll-calls and after discussion. Why? Because in the teeth of your own report, notwithstanding that the poor epileptic and many other people like him throughout the length and breadth of the country demand this just relief, notwithstanding you said he was entitled to it, yet the President, out of whose eyes and from whose hands springs the success of your party, as you think, and your patronage, is to be protected in every position he takes. I grant the President has his duty to perform. So have I my duty to perform.

I will tell you how it looks to me. The President of the United States is the Chief Executive of the greatest and richest Government upon the face of this earth, a Government that is spending nearly $400,000,000 a year for its service—a country of vast extent, rapidly increasing in population and in wealth, with foreign questions and internal questions trooping giant-like for solution—yet we find him brushing them aside, leaving them to take care of themselves. In the mean time he does not appear to be anxious to please anybody except that solid knot of his party that comes from the solid South; he wants their approval, in my opinion, because they cast a solid vote in conventions and at the ballot-box.

There he stands, looking through a gimlet-hole with a magnifying glass at this and other pension bills which give $8 a month to the poor soldier who lost his health in the defense of his country, looking for excuses to interpose a veto; and in many cases, not content with interposing his veto, seemingly, imbued by the same spirit that actuated the persecutors of Christ upon the cross, jeers and derides the unfortunate soldiers for disabilities received while in the service, for the relief of which from the Treasury of a grateful people his veto is the sole barrier. [Applause on the Republican side.] And this is statesmanship! Defend it if you dare. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes; you will have to defend it before November. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, the gentlemen on the other side who are clapping their hands in approval of the President can defend it; they have the kind of constituents that do not believe in pensions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, unless I miss my guess, you will find, gentlemen, that you have defended it in vain, and these men who are entitled to these pensions, sustained by the public opinion and the sense of justice of this country, will send a Congress here that will pass these bills and other just pension legislation over the vetoes of this President. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to introduce this bill for the relief of Catherine McCarty, and I wish to be heard with regard to it for a few moments. I wish to treat both the Executive and the Committee on Invalid Pensions with perfect respect.

What is the case before the House? Is there any dispute as to the facts in this case? None, whatever. The facts are all ascertained and there is no disagreement about them. The question that I put to the House, then, is this: Can not this case be disposed of without referring it again to the committee and disposed of with perfect respect to the Executive and to the committee? Why, the rules of the House allow it to be so disposed of, and certainly they are not framed with a view to any possible disrespect toward either the Executive or any committee of this House.

There would be a good reason for recommitting the bill if there were any dispute as to the facts; but, there being no such dispute, what occasion can there be for the motion of the gentleman from Indiana? This soldier, as is shown by the testimony, accidentally took poison and died a few hours afterward. There is no claim that he committed suicide. He was regularly in the service of his country and died there. His aged widow is poor and has lived a life of hardship and poverty. She is now old, and I say every precept of justice demands that she should have a pension for the remainder of her days, which can not be many at best.

Now, if any gentleman can tell me how there can be any possible shade of disrespect to the Executive or to the Committee on Invalid Pensions by our considering this bill now, I will consent that it be again referred to the committee. I want to disclaim here any purpose or any intention whatever to cast any disrespect upon the Executive for the exercise of his constitutional prerogative. He has his duty to perform; I have mine, and each is entirely independent of the other, and made so by the Constitution, and each must perform that duty guided by the best light attainable.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman will remember that the proposition in this case is simply to ask the committee to report it back next week.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly, and I am very sorry the motion was made at all. I shall support it in preference to a motion to refer without instructions, but I think there is no reason in the world why we can not act upon this bill here and now, and determine whether Catherine McCarty shall have a pension under existing circumstances. I knew perfectly well that this woman was not entitled to a pension under the general law, but I thought the equities and the circumstances surrounding the case were so peculiar as to justifiy the House in departing from the rule and placing her by special act upon the pension-roll. I thought so then; I think so now.

In my judgment, this is a case that ought never to have been vetoed. In that opinion I am at variance with the Executive. The House has a perfect right to pass a law to place anybody upon the pension-roll if they think the circumstances justify it, whether existing law contemplates it or not. That is the theory upon which all special acts proceed, and there is no disrespect implied if the House insists upon its judgment that a pension should be granted in this or any other particular case. I will stand by the President in every veto that in my judgment is right, but I have a duty to perform here to my constituents and my conscience; and I say that, under the circumstances, this bill ought to pass, and I hope that we shall get a vote upon it directly here and now.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this simple proposition to instruct the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report this bill back by Monday next has taken a very wide range; and I shall not undertake to follow the speeches of all the gentlemen who have spoken. My colleague from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] took an old route. He thought it safer and better to predict what was going to happen, and to promise in an implied way to the soldiers of this country what the Republican party would do, than to undertake to go back and see what that party has done. But some of the gentlemen who followed him were less discreet, and thought that perhaps it would be well to review the past and ascertain how the balance stood between the Democratic party on the one side and the Republican party on the other in their attempts to give friendly legislation to the soldier. And some of these gentlemen have gone into details in order to bring before the country the acts of legislation in behalf of the soldiers during the period since the war; and they find that in their judgment all the friendly legislation which has been enacted has emanated from the Republican party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is not the record. In the first place, the President of the United States has been severely arraigned here to-day because he has seen fit, upon private pension bills, each one involving a different and distinct set of facts, to express his solemn judgment, as he is required by the Constitution to do. Gentlemen say that this is an unfriendly thing, and shows to the soldiers of the country that the Democratic party is unfriendly to the soldier; but they shut their eyes to the fact that when General Grant was President of the United States and when that bill which above all others was friendly to the soldiers of this country, which would have benefited more soldiers than any other bill ever passed by Congress was submitted to him, he allowed that bill to fail for want of his signature. Yet gentlemen have no words of condemnation for that; but they propose to abuse Mr. Cleveland, the present President, because he has vetoed certain private pension bills; and they say the balance is on their side.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. MATSON. I do not. Gentlemen say that the comparison between the two parties as to their course on this subject shows the balance on their side. I will submit, and gladly submit, to the soldiers of this country the question as to where the balance is. All the legislation friendly to the soldier that has amounted to anything since the war has been given by a Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. BRUMM. By Republican votes.

Mr. MATSON. It was a Democratic House that originated, and under the leadership of General Rice, a one-legged Democratic soldier, passed the original bill giving arrears of pension.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman state the vote as it was given in the House?

Mr. MATSON. I decline to yield.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How many Democrats voted for it and how many Republicans?

Mr. MATSON. I decline to yield. Not only did a Democratic House do that, but I turn to the action of the Forty-seventh Congress. And here I want to be fair to my friend from Indiana, because I think heretofore I may have said something which reflected upon him. He was fair, and I want to be equally fair. I do not blame him in the matter, because as I understand no bill in relation to this arrears question was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, of which he was then chairman; therefore it is not to him, but to the Republican party, that the blame attaches. In that Congress, with a majority on the other side, not even a bill was reported to this House for the purpose of giving arrears of pension. There is the record on that proposition. Yet you say and insist that you are the friends, and that the Democrats are the enemies, of pension legislation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What was the action of the gentleman himself when we attempted to attach the arrears bill to the widows' pension bill in this Congress?

Mr. MATSON. I have not time to yield; I will come to that question.

More than that on this question of arrears. Every man on the other side of the House knows that the additional arrears can not be paid without more money; and within the last two weeks the Republicans in this House spent a whole day in filibustering to prevent the adoption of a resolution to enable this House to raise money to pay arrears or to pay any general pensions. [Applause on the Democratic side, and derisive cries on the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. You wanted to make a rule that would never allow another pension measure to pass.

Mr. MATSON. It is all promises on your side; when it comes to the practical work of raising money to pay the soldiers their pensions, you filibuster and will not join in carrying, as you ought to do, any measure looking to that end.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It is all hypocrisy with you. You know that the rule proposed would not allow any further pension legislation; and that is why you stood by it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has declined to yield and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MATSON. Now, gentlemen have talked about pension bills being vetoed. They forget that nearly all of these bills which have been vetoed and nearly all which have been signed by President Cleveland were vetoed by a Republican Commissioner of Pensions years ago. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet you say that President Cleveland ought to be blamed——

Mr. CUTCHEON. The Commissioner was bound by existing law; we want to make new laws that will enable these soldiers to be pensioned.

Mr. MATSON. Nine-tenths of these cases are cases where the right to a pension was asserted at the Pension Office and denied, and we come here and give the parties relief. And the President, in cases of that kind, has signed fifteen bills to one he has vetoed, although your Republican Commissioner years ago had vetoed a very large proportion of them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Do you hold that the Commissioner did so unlawfully?

Mr. MATSON. I hold that the Commissioner did right, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Very well; then say so.

Mr. MATSON. I hold, however, that the refusal of the Commissioner to grant these pensions does not prove that he was unfriendly to the soldiers any more than these vetoes prove that President Cleveland is unfriendly. Here are men charged with the exercise of a grave official duty. They propose to exercise it, as they should, upon their conscience; and when we come to consider these questions, they ought to be considered by us not only deliberately, but in a judicial temper, with no disposition to abuse the President or anybody else.

Some gentleman here said that all these bills which have been vetoed by the President were reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions unanimously. The gentleman who made that assertion perhaps did not know the facts. In regard to many bills reported to this House a bare majority in the committee votes for them. Perhaps, and probably in the case of many of these vetoed bills, only a bare majority of the committee—perhaps only a majority of a quorum of the committee—voted to report the bills favorably to the House. That is the fact; and it is unfair for gentlemen to assert that all these bills have been unanimously reported. We have not seen fit to make minority reports. Where there was a majority of a quorum in favor of the bills, we have allowed them to come before the House. But I want to say, in confirmation of what was said by the gentleman from Iowa, that every one of these bills has been considered by a quorum of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The members of that committee have been at work industriously; they have done the very best they could.

If the President takes issue with them it is not only the duty of this committee but it is the duty of this House to give the committee opportunity to review the matter deliberately, to look at all the facts calmly, and see whether we are right or the President is right on this proposition. When we have determined that, if we do not report as soon as some gentlemen think we ought to, the Speaker of this House himself has said it continues to be a question of privilege, and any gentleman may rise in his seat and move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and bring it before the House for action if a majority supports the motion.

Where is the injustice, where is the injury to anybody by acting in a deliberate manner, and carefully, coolly, and calmly reviewing each case and reporting to the House before calling upon the House to pass a bill over the veto of the President?

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Indiana state to the House how many bills have been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions in this House as compared with the bills reported by previous committees?

Mr. MATSON. It is almost impossible to state exactly. My judgment is there have been some six hundred bills reported favorably from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and perhaps an equal number reported adversely. Then there have been a large number considered by the committee which were determined adversely or which individual members examined and thought without merit, which have been allowed to remain without further action.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How does the number reported favorably at this Congress compare with the number reported during the Forty-seventh Congress?

Mr. MATSON. So far as that comparison is concerned I leave it to my colleague on the other side [Mr. BROWNE] who was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions at that time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My recollection is that during the time I was chairman I reported four hundred cases; and as it is seldom I have an opportunity to declare a balance in my colleague's favor, I will do it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. A while ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] made the statement that the majority of the cases passed by the House had been passed over the adverse report of your committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That statement was not made by be.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood it was.

Mr. MATSON. If the statement was made the gentleman was mistaken.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then state how many there were.

Mr. MATSON. Only one or two, and those were adverse reports on bills increasing pensions of the widows of officers.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My friend will find there are more than that number. I will not controvert his statement, but I never made the statement my friend from Iowa understood me to make. I merely stated there was action of that sort.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many pension cases have been passed by this Congress?

Mr. MATSON. In the neighborhood of five hundred cases have been passed by this Congress. The President has affirmatively approved a majority of them. I have seen a list of eighty-eight sent in during one day of bills approved affirmatively.

In regard to this case, there is no reason why it should be preferred over others, and that is all there is in this proposition.

If the House votes the committee shall report this case on next Monday, we of course will try to do it. But what reason is there this case shall be selected out from all others to be reported to the House?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The reason I suggest is that there is no dispute about the facts.

Mr. MATSON. There may be no dispute about the facts, and yet there are matters connected with every case which should be investigated. There is here a question of negligence which may require very careful consideration. There may be carelessness amounting to gross negligence that no court would disregard.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. There is no difficulty about the facts in this case.

Mr. MATSON. The House by unanimous consent sent forty of these bills to that committee. There is no ground to suppose these will be smothered in that committee. On the contrary, we have reported two cases already to be passed over the President's veto. We believe these cases to be right, and on reconsideration stand by them. If we ascertain on an investigation of any of these cases that they ought to have that course and be passed, notwithstanding the veto of the President, the committee will not hesitate to recommend it. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to smother anybody's bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Was not the consideration of a bill which was reported back from the committee with the recommendation that it be passed over the veto postponed by the consent of the committee?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir; and for a very good reason. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a matter of such grave public importance as that it ought to interfere with the consideration of great appropriation bills. I apprehend that there is no trouble about relieving these claimants or getting their claims through where the vetoes are wrong; at least getting them considered. There is no difficulty about it at all. We will report them just as fast as we can; and just as fast as we arrive at a conclusion on them that they ought to be reported favorably we will do so, and if we reach bills that we think ought not to be reported back favorably we will not hesitate to say so.

I now demand the previous question upon the motion and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, to instruct the committee to report the bill back to the House on or before Monday next, there were on a division—ayes 84, noes 99.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 127, not voting 81; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. KETCHAM, until Friday next.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, with Mr. MORROW, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with Mr. SEYMOUR on the last vote. As he did not vote on this call, I will consider the pair as still in force.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. MATSON to refer the bill and message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it was agreed to.

SALLY ANN BRADLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 5394, entitled "An act granting a pension to Sally Ann Bradley."

The husband of this proposed beneficiary was discharged from the military service in 1865, after a long service, and was afterward pensioned for gunshot wound.

He died in 1882. The widow appears to have never filed a claim for pension in her own right.

No cause is given of the soldier's death, but it is not claimed that it resulted from his military service, her pension being asked for entirely because of her needs and the faithful service of her husband and her sons.

This presents the question whether a gift in such a case is a proper disposition of money appropriated for the purpose of paying pensions.

The passage of this law would, in my opinion, establish a precedent so far-reaching, and open the door to such a vast multitude of claims not on principle within our present pension laws, that I am constrained to disapprove the bill under consideration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move to refer the bill and the message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask to amend the motion.

Mr. BRUMM. I have an amendment I would like to offer.

Mr. BAYNE. I think the gentleman who introduced the bill should be given the right to offer this amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I introduced this bill in Congress, and think I certainly should have the right of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to amend that motion?

The SPEAKER. Not with the previous question pending. If the previous question is not ordered it will be open to amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. They will have a good time getting it.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 80, no 1.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Under the rule, after the previous question has been moved, or even after it has been ordered, may there not be a motion to instruct?

The SPEAKER. Not on this question. This is not upon the passage of a proposition, but upon a motion to refer. Under the rule of the House, which was adopted for the first time in the Forty-sixth Congress, it was provided that it should be in order when a bill was on its passage and the previous question had been demanded or ordered to move to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Under the rule when the previous question is ordered on a proposition on which there has been no discussion are there not fifteen minutes allowed on each side for debate?

The SPEAKER. If the proposition on which the previous question is ordered was debatable, then under the rule fifteen minutes are allowed for debate on each side after the ordering of the previous question on a proposition on which there has been no debate. But a simple motion to refer, except on a matter reported by a committee, is not debatable. In this case if the previous question should be ordered there would be no debate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. MATSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 7, not voting 187; as follows:

There was no objection.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. SWINBURNE, for the rest of the day.

The SPEAKER. Upon this vote the yeas are 129, the nays are 7. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. MATSON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] if he will not agree to thirty minutes' debate? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MATSON, it was agreed to; and a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2707) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to finally determine the claim of Charles E. Creecy for use of the Schillinger patent in the Capitol grounds, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 2820) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to finally determine the claim of Charles E. Creecy for use of the Schillinger patent in the Capitol grounds; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 1983) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Reading, Pa.; and

A bill (H. R. 4503) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the Carrollton and Lock No. 1 Turnpike Road Company to locate and construct its road on land belonging to the United States at lock No. 1, on the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8023) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a bridge by the municipalities of Menominee, Mich., and Marinette, Wis., over Menominee River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GRAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2821) authorizing the publication of certain additional volumes of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion to be distributed to posts of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SEWELL. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit to the Senator from New Jersey that the bill should properly be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWELL. I have no objection to the reference to the Committee on Printing. I think probably that refence would be better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, has passed the Senate, but was not printed as passed. I suppose it might still be printed though it has passed the Senate, and I ask for an order that the bill be printed as passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks for an order to print a certain bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is granted.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent and other resolutions" are now in order. If there be none such, under the special order of yesterday the Calendar will be laid before the Senate as the order of the day until half past 12 o'clock. The order adopted yesterday will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That for the next six days of the legislative sittings of the Senate, after the call for and disposition of resolutions shall have been passed, the time remaining until half past 12 o'clock shall be devoted to the Calendar, beginning with the first case thereon, and every matter objected to shall be passed by, and debate shall be limited to five minutes for any Senator on the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels bound to say that under the order which was made yesterday, in the opinion of the Chair morning business is not in order after the call of the Calendar is commenced. It is but fair that the Chair should receive morning business, although it is expressly excluded by the terms of the order made yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Calendar is to be called from the beginning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is to be called from the beginning, on page 1. The first case will be stated.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATES.

The bill (S. 59) to reimburse the several States for interest paid on war loans, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The bill (S. 714) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. I object to that. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over. It is a special order any way.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON.

The bill (S. 7) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

MAILING OF LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 260) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over. The next case will be reported.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER December 16, 1885, and reported by Mr. HARRISON from the Committee on Territories adversely January 11, 1886, instructing the Committee on Territories to inquire under what authority a so-called State Legislature has been organized in the Territory of Dakota, was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. TELLER. That and the following resolution ought to go over. They are both reported adversely.

The resolution submitted by Mr. VEST December 17, 1885, and reported adversely by Mr. HARRISON from the Committee on Territories January 11, 1886, relative to the memorial of certain persons calling themselves "the State executive committee of the State of Dakota," was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] whether there is any objection to the indefinite postponement of these two orders of business, 26 and 27. They relate to the Dakota matter.

Mr. VEST. I suppose the resolutions may be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask then that they be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

WILLIAM M. MAYNADIER.

The bill (S. 98) for the relief of William M. Maynadier, a paymaster in the United States Army, was announced as next in order.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. CONGER subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to go back and take up the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook, which was reached before I came into the Chamber, and to which I understand the Senator from New York by mistake objected, thinking it was another bill.

Mr. MILLER. I supposed I was objecting to Senate bill 1200, the bill in charge of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as he was not in the Chamber at the moment. It was not my intention to object to the Crook bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the bill will be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent to go back to the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William H. Crook $6,000, as compensation for services as secretary to the President to sign land patents for the fiscal years 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, inclusive, and which services were additional to his regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing agent, the amount being the same as was formerly paid for such service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF MAURICE GRIVOT.

The bill (S. 177) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

WRECK OF THE TALLAPOOSA.

The bill (S. 702) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, January 21, 1886:

This bill provides an appropriation simply sufficient to enable the officers to refurnish themselves with an outfit. We are assured that it will be just about sufficient for that purpose. The first section also provides for the payment of $100 to each of the surviving seamen, which we think will about cover the actual loss that each one of them sustained. Both officers and men were rescued destitute of everything, and all they ask is simply to be refurnished with an outfit suitable to the service to which they belong.

For this bill there are many precedents. Under similar circumstances in 1848 a bill was passed for the relief of the relatives of those who were lost on the brig Somers, the precise language of which has been copied in the second section of this bill. That precedent was followed in 1853 in the case of the brig Washington, and in 1854 in the case of the Grampus, and again in 1870 in the case of the Oneida, which was run down in the early part of that year near the coast of China, and also in the case of the U. S. S. Huron, lost off the coast of North Carolina in 1877.

The U. S. S. Tallapoosa was run into and sunk at about 11 o'clock on the night of August 21, 1884, in Vineyard Sound. The officers were fully exonerated from any charge of carelessness or negligence as will be readily seen by a careful perusal of the following communication from the Navy Department, which gives the findings of the board of inquiry convened to investigate the loss of that vessel, and in which is also expressed the opinion of the Department on the report of said board.

The findings of the court of inquiry, consisting of Captains D. B. Harmony, R. F. Bradford, and F. M. Bunce, concerning the collision between the naval steamer Tallapoosa and the schooner James S. Lowell, were in substance as follows:

That on the night of the 21st of August, 1884, about 11 p. m., the Tallapoosa was on her way from Boston to Newport, R. I., off East Chop light in Vineyard Sound, steering her course by the lights; the navigating officer, the officer of the deck, and the commanding officer being on deck, the latter personally in charge of the conduct of the vessel; that the sky was clear with a haze about the horizon, and a strong breeze blowing from the southwest; the tide flood setting to the eastward, from 1 to 1½ knots an hour; the Tallapoosa steaming against wind and tide, making about 8½ knots, over the ground; that when entering the channel between the Hedge Fence and Squash Meadow Shoals, at the point between buoys about 1½ miles in width, the schooner Lowell was reported one and a half to two points on the starboard bow; that the Lowell was of 700 tons, laden with coal; was moving at a speed of about 9 knots through the water and 10 over the ground, and in about three minutes the vessels were in collision; the Tallapoosa was sunk and the Lowell badly damaged; that on sighting the lights of the schooner the steamer's helm was put to starboard and the steamer steadied when she had fallen off about three-quarters of a point; that constant watch was kept upon the schooner's lights, and suddenly the green light disappeared and only the red could be seen; that the steamer's helm was then put hard to starboard, her whistle blown twice and then sounded repeatedly, but her speed was retained; that she was struck by the schooner about 40 feet from the bow, on the starboard side, at an angle of from thirty to seventy degrees with the line of the keel from the bow; that the schooner on sighting the lights of the steamer one-half point on the port bow, as seen from leeward under the sails, kept her course until the green light of the steamer was seen, then put her helm to port and struck the steamer, as described; that the evidence that the red light of the steamer was seen by the schooner's people soon after her mast-head light was disregarded by the court, as the relative positions of the two vessels, as established by each of them, would render it impossible for the red light of the steamer to be at any time visible from the schooner; that the steamer did all that she was able to do in her position to avoid the collision, and complied with the law in every and all respects, as she was in the direct course of the schooner when she first sighted her, and that the schooner when she saw the green light of the steamer, instead of holding her course, did, by putting her helm to port and altering her course, violate section 4233, Revised Statutes (rules 23 and 24), for preventing collisions. The court is of the opinion, therefore, that the blame for the collision rests with the schooner. The court is glad to add the fact that every effort was made by the people of both vessels to save life.

The Navy Department approved the findings above referred to, not relying alone on the testimony of the officers and crew of the Tallapoosa, that they saw the schooner change her course and that her sails were actually shaking when she struck, and that therefore she caused the collision, but basing its approval also upon the admissions in the testimony of the witnesses on the schooner. Master Reed, of the Lowell, testified that before the vessels came together he ordered the helm hard down. Being asked why he gave this manifestly wrong order he answered, absurdly, that it was because the steamer had shown her green light, from which fact he inferred that she had starboarded her helm. Being asked why he did not, therefore, if he took the responsibility of changing his course, put his helm hard up instead of luffing directly into the steamer, he gave no reason except that his impression was that "hard up" or "hard to starboard" would cause the schooner to strike the steamer amidships, instead of forward near the bow, when both vessels would go down. The boy at the wheel, twenty years of age, also testified that the captain gave him the order to put the helm hard down, and that he gave her a couple of spokes.

The statement made and signed by the captain the second morning after the collision was as follows:

Statement Capt. F. K. Reed, schooner Jas. S. Lowell, of Bath.

We came into sound and going down on course SE. by E. ½ E., a red light was reported by the watch ahead; before this a white light had been reported ahead, and I knew it was a steamer, and I thought red to red go clear. Suddenly I saw a green light ahead, and I gave the order hard a port, and we came together about S. from E. buoy on Hedge fence about 11 p. m., August 21, 1884.

F. K. REED.

From this testimony of the schooner's witnesses, therefore, the Department decided that if the schooner had kept her course, as she was bound to do, there would have been no collision, and that the change of course on her part and the giving of the directly wrong order by her captain was the sole cause of the collision. The claim made at the trial that, although the order was given to put the helm hard down, this was not done before the collision, is treated by the Department as an afterthought and is disregarded.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to that bill. I have charge of it, and I do not propose to ask the Senate to take it up in this order of business. It is proper perhaps to say that I am informed that a bill dealing with the same subject is likely to be considered in a few days elsewhere. I presume even the ghost of the Senator from Vermont would not object to that statement. It is a matter of great importance and is very much interesting the people. I do not propose to call up the bill at this session of Congress, but I should like to have it retain whatever place it has, so that if I should desire at a later day I may ask the Senate to set it down for some day in the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

MAJ. G. W. CANDEE.

The bill (S. 725) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Maj. G. W. Candee, a paymaster in the Army, $2,650, being the amount stolen from him at Fort Arbuckle, Indian Territory, in the fall of 1869, and which was restored by him out of private funds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. MORGAN.

The bill (S. 528) for the relief of William H. Morgan was announced as the next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. That is an adverse report. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears none.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. That had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

WILBUR F. STEELE.

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of Wilbur F. Steele was the next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that that matter may lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that can be disposed of under this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator from Connecticut does not object to that?

Mr. PLATT. It can not be disposed of under this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case will be reported.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair heard the objection very distinctly. It was made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Chair could have order enough preserved so that we might know what is going on. I was very anxious that that joint resolution should pass, and I was listening for objection. I did not hear it. I wish the Chair would put the proposition again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Connecticut to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I said it was manifest that it could not be passed under the five-minute rule. It is a divided report of the committee, the views of the minority are submitted, and without expressing any opinion whatever on the subject I do not think we can consider it this morning. Therefore I objected, and do object.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy, and fixing the salary of the same, was next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over on objection.

LANDS OF YAKAMA INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 1211) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the confederated tribes and bands of Indians occupying the Yakama reservation, in the Territory of Washington, for the extinguishment of their title to so much of said reservation as is required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at one time hitherto at length. Is it the desire that it shall be read again?

Mr. DAWES. Nobody desires that it shall be read again. It is merely ratifying an agreement that is made satisfactorily to all parties, by which the Northern Pacific Railroad Company pay for the land they take.

Mr. TELLER. They have already taken it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALKER RIVER INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1056) to accept and ratify an agreement made by the Pah-Ute Indians, and granting a right of way to the Carson and Colorado Railroad Company through the Walker River reservation, in Nevada.

Mr. DAWES. That is just like the preceding.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution for the consideration of executive nominations in open session, submitted by Mr. PLATT January 29, 1886, and reported adversely by Mr. INGALLS from the Committee on Rules February 8, 1886.

Mr. HOAR. Let that be passed over.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his objection to the resolution for a moment, that I may make a motion relating to it. I will state the motion I desire to make. I desire to make a motion that this resolution be postponed to, and made the special order for, Wednesday, the 8th day of December next, at 2 o'clock. I think there will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the pending resolution be postponed until Wednesday, the 8th day of December next, and that it be made the special order for 2 o'clock on that day. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ELON A. MARSH AND MINARD LAFEVER.

The bill (S. 500) for the relief of Elon A. Marsh and Minard Lafever was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

STEPHEN N. SMITH.

The bill (S. 708) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the patent granted to Stephen N. Smith on the 13th of June, 1882, for "improvements in machines for making lacing-hooks," and which patent on the face thereof was granted for the term of seventeen years from its date, shall be made a valid grant for the full term of seventeen years from the date of the patent, notwithstanding the fact that a patent had been previously granted to said Smith in Canada for the same invention.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. DODGE.

The bill (S. 301) for the relief of William C. Dodge was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Let that go over. The amount is blank.

Mr. PLATT. We recommend $10,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Patents propose an amendment to fill the blank; but the bill being objected to, goes over.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS FOR HORSES.

The bill (S. 78) to extend the time for filing certain claims for compensation for horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States was announced as being the next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being adversely reported, will be passed over unless it is the desire to postpone it indefinitely. ["Yes."] If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection.

OVERVALUATION OF THE AUSTRIAN FLORIN.

The bill (S. 599) to refund excessive duties caused by extraordinary overvaluation of the Austrian florin in the year 1878 was announced as next in order.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

A. H. VON LUETTWITZ.

The bill (S. 794) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that A. H. Von Luettwitz, while a first lieutenant in the Third Regiment of United States Cavalry, on the 9th of September, 1876, and while in command of a battalion of his regiment, composed of detachments from five of its companies, and while attacking and capturing a village of hostile Sioux Indians, was dangerously wounded, necessitating amputation of the right leg above the knee, and very narrowly escaping with his life; that First Lieut. A. H. Von Luettwitz was retired from active service on the 5th of May, 1879; and that at the date of his retirement he was on the eve of promotion, and would be a captain in his regiment now and since June, 1881. The bill therefore authorizes the President to place Von Luettwitz on the retired-list with the rank and pay of a captain of cavalry on the retired-list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

RAILROAD AND CANAL IN FLORIDA.

The bill (S. 470) for the survey and estimate for a railroad from the mainland to Key West, Fla., and for a canal connecting the same with the Saint John's River, for military and naval purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. Let that go over.

The bill (S. 145) for the relief of James Bainter was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is adversely reported.

WILLIAM TABB.

The bill (S. 1310) for the relief of William Tabb was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William Tabb, of Spottsylvania County, near Fredericksburg, Va., of $2,149.75, in full for supplies taken from him, during the years 1863 and 1864, by and for the use of United States troops.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL NAVIGATION COMPANY.

The bill (S. 805) to authorize certain foreign-built steamships in the service of the International Navigation Company to be registered as vessels of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that.

FLORIDA INDIAN WAR CLAIM.

The bill (S. 1729) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilites was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. That has been passed and reconsidered; let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MOBILE MARINE DOCK COMPANY.

The bill (S. 300) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

FOREST RESERVATION AT CLARK'S FORK.

The bill (S. 581) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters of Clark's Fork of the Columbia River was announced as next in order, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been heretofore read at length.

Mr. PLATT. If it is not a long bill I should like to hear it read.

Mr. MILLER. It has been read twice at length and was passed at the last session.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERNEST H. WARDWELL.

The bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that ought to be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The bill will go over under objection.

Mr. HAMPTON. Was there objection made to that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HAMPTON. I hope the Senator from Iowa will withdraw the objection. The bill has been passed over twice already, I think. The bill had a favorable report at the last session and was passed by the other House and has been reported favorably at this session. I do not think there is a more deserving case on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I had an impression that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], was not in favor of this bill, and he being absent, I objected on that account.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Illinois is in the cloak-room.

Mr. HAMPTON. I could not hear what the Senator from Connecticut said.

Mr. PLATT. I said I had the impression that the chairman of the committee was not in favor of the passage of the bill, and he being absent, I objected. I have no objection to its being passed over without prejudice until he comes in.

Mr. HAMPTON. I did not notice his absence.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator is right here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally.

HEIRS OF MICHAEL O'BRIEN.

The bill (S. 1249) for the relief of the heirs of Michael O'Brien was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that that go over, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] who reported it is absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over on objection.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is one of importance, and I should suppose it could hardly be passed now under the limitation of the five-minute rule. I should be willing to have it assigned for a day certain.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] who reported it is not present, and perhaps it had better be passed over informally.

Mr. INGALLS. Until he comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADMINISTRATOR OF RUDOLPH LESCHOT, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 2101) for the relief of Edward G. Thompson, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The bill (S. 1884) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think we can consider that under the five-minute rule. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over under objection.

INQUESTS UNDER NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

The bill (S. 2171) to provide for inquests under national authority was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not consider that this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. HOAR. What Senator objects to that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] objects.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not consider it under the five-minute rule.

WILLIAM H. AKINS AND JACOB D. FELTHOUSER.

The bill (S. 1803) for the relief of William H. Akins and Jacob D. Felthouser was announced as next in order.

Several Senators objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF PETER LYLE.

The consideration of the bill (S. 701) for the relief of the legal representatives of Peter Lyle, deceased, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. That is a short bill. Let it be read once more.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR from the Committee on Pensions, April 20, 1886. Having proceeded for some time,

Mr. PLATT. I do not ask for any further reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be suspended. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object until we hear the report read.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. TELLER. Then let the report be read.

Mr. CAMERON. The report is long.

Mr. PLATT. I called for the reading of the report. Enough of it was read to show that a pension was granted to this officer and that he died the next day, and the bill is to authorize the money to be drawn by his heirs. Under those circumstances, I did not care to have the long report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to object? The report is very long.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the preamble be read.

The Chief Clerk read the preamble of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the last part of the report on pages 6 and 7 be read, which states the facts.

Mr. CAMERON. Has the Senator read the report?

Mr. COCKRELL. I want it to go on record to show the reasons why we make this exception. There will be hundreds and perhaps thousands of cases similar presented unless we place on record the exact grounds on which we make this exception.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Your committee are of opinion that the evidence shows that there were several persons who rendered medical attendance, who furnished money, nursed, and clothed, and fed this unfortunate ward of the nation during his long continued last sickness, and that these expenses and attentions were necessary to keep this brave old wounded soldier, who had served his country so faithfully, from starvation, beggary, and rags, or from the almshouse. It is shown that for the payment of these services and expenses rendered by comrades and others the soldier had pledged his honor, and had based his pledge upon his claim for arrears of pension due him; that his last sickness continued for three years immediately preceding his death, and that during all this time he was wholly unable to labor or in any way provide for his maintenance. This indebtedness, as judicially established, amounts to $3,909.86; and judgments for this amount have been rendered by the courts against the administrator, Vincent P. Donnelly.

The amount awarded by the certificate was $3,724, and would have been used to liquidate the above debt if the soldier had lived to actually receive it. The present bill simply proposes to pay this amount to said administrator, as the law, as officially construed, seems to interpose a technical bar to such payment.

Your committee are of opinion that even under section 4718, Revised Statutes, this amount might be properly considered as necessary to reimburse "the expenses of the last sickness and burial of the decedent." In view of all the facts, it would seem that the Government should, as a matter of justice, pay this claim, and thus discharge the obligations in honor of this brave soldier, who gave his life to the service of his country; and we therefore report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill should, however, be amended by striking out all the preamble between the title and the enacting clause.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Pensions striking out the preamble will be considered agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; and the preamble is stricken out.

ROBLEY D. EVANS AND RICHARD M. GREEN.

The bill (S. 1361) for the relief of Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an amendment reported from the Committee on Patents, in line 6, striking out "forty" and inserting "four;" so as to make the bill read: "The sum of $4,000, in payment in full of all the demands for the past and future use by the Government of the United States of their patented invention for bending metal links in the manufacture of cable and other chain," &c.; which was agreed to when the bill was previously under consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF HENRY S. FRENCH.

The bill (S. 609) for the relief of the legal representative of Henry S. French was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, under objection.

PAY OF GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

The bill (S. 882) to equalize the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think the Senator from Kansas can not possibly object if he understands the case. If he will hear the bill read I think he will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the next case will be stated.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

The bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEORGE. It is necessary to amend the bill in a formal way by striking out, in section 6, line 11, "July" and inserting "October;" and striking out "five," after "eighty," and inserting "six;" so as to read:

The first payment to be made on the 1st day of October, 1886.

It now reads "the 1st day of July, 1885." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that some of the Territories have provided for agricultural colleges; Dakota has; and I ask whether there can be any objection to extending this bill so as to embrace the Territories that have provided agricultural colleges.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. I think that is very proper.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I move to amend as follows: In section 1, line 9, after the word "State," I move to insert "or Territory;" so as to read:

"There shall be established in connection with the college or colleges in each State or Territory," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in section 1, line 17, I move to insert after the word "State" the words "or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Then at the end of line 18, in the same section, I move to insert the same words "or Territory" after "State;" and also after the word "State," in line 20, to insert the same words "or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in section 4, line 17, I move to insert the same words "or Territory" after "State."

Mr. MILLER. In section 6, line 6, the words "or Territory" should be inserted after "State."

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, I have it. In line 21 of section 2, after the words "needs of the respective States," the words "or Territories" should be added. I move the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Then in line 17 of section 4 I move to insert the words "or Territory" after "State," and in line 6 of section 6, on the same page, I move the same amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In line 22 of section 6 I move the same amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. These are the only places where these words need to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary suggests line 5 of section 5.

Mr. HARRISON. Line 5 of section 5; yes. After the words "each newspaper in the States" the words "or Territory" should be added.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. This is a very important bill. I do not know but that I am in favor of it; I presume I am; but I suggest whether it would not be well to have it go over informally until to-morrow morning that we may examine it in reference to these different proposed amendments, and have it taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. MILLER. I hope not. We understand it now as well as we ever shall.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendments are all adjusted to the Territorial feature.

Mr. HARRISON. I had my attention called to this matter some time ago, but was not expecting the bill to come up this morning. Of course the amendments that I have moved have been suggested very hastily; and unless the Senator from Mississippi, who has looked into the matter, sees some objection to them, I think they cover the ground to extend this relief to the Territories where agricultural colleges are established.

Mr. GEORGE. I agree to that. The bill having been amended now in all that is necessary to adjust it to that state of affairs, I hope it will be passed.

Mr. CHACE. I am in no sense opposed to this bill, but I should like to say that I have one or two amendments that I wish to offer, and perhaps they may provoke a little discussion. I ask whether it would not be better to have the bill go over and be considered to-morrow morning by special understanding.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator may offer his amendments. If he has a proper amendment to the bill, let it be offered and let us see what it is. I object to a postponement. I want the bill passed now. It has been on the Calendar a long time, and has been thoroughly considered by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. The State of Connecticut has agricultural experimentation fully provided for, substantially in accordance with section 2 of this bill; but I want to know whether this cuts off our existing system; I want to know whether we can conveniently adapt ourselves to it under the arrangement we have already. I suppose I am in favor of the purpose of the bill, but I object, because the Senators in charge of it do not consent to the postponement. Let it be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator can exercise his right and he can kill the bill, as he undoubtedly will. It has been called on the Calendar repeatedly, and has gone over on the request of the Senators that they might investigate it. It may go over at the request of every Senator here, and that may end the bill. If the Senator from Connecticut desires to do that, he has the privilege.

Mr. CHACE. I wish it understood that I am making no objection to the bill being considered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am in favor of the bill, but it is the first time I ever happened to see it or hear of it.

Mr. MILLER. The committee are not to blame for the fault of the Senator from Connecticut in not knowing what is going on in the body.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will vote to take it up at any time.

Mr. GEORGE. Let us pass it over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have unanimous consent that it be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope so.

Mr. HARRISON. Before anything is done, I wish Senators would yield to me a moment to complete the line of amendments I have had made by putting in the same words in line 3 of the last section.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw any objection temporarily, of course.

Mr. HARRISON. I move in line 3 of section 8, after the words "government of the States," to insert the words "or Territories."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be considered agreed to. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] asks unanimous consent that the bill go over until to-morrow morning, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MILLER. There has been objection made, and it has gone over.

Mr. INGALLS. I believe the understanding is that it is to be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. GEORGE. That is my understanding, that it is to be taken up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar, liable to be called up.

Mr. GIBSON. There is no objection to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case will be called.

PAY OF GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Objection having been withdrawn to the bill immediately preceding the one considered, I should like to return to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is Order of Business 843, being Senate bill 882, to equalize the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The bill was read, and there being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act ensigns in the Navy shall receive during the first five years after the date of commission, when at sea, $1,400; on shore duty, $1,200; on leave or waiting orders, $1,000; after five years from such date, when at sea, $1,600; on shore duty, $1,400; on leave or waiting orders, $1,200; and section 1556 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended accordingly

Mr. McPHERSON. I will state all that there is of the bill without waiting to have the report read.

The ensigns in the Navy at the present time can not get out of that grade until they have been in the service about fifteen years. They receive but $1,200 a year, while in the staff corps of the Navy with relative grade and rank they receive $1,700. They have asked for an increase to make their pay equal to the staff of the Navy with relative rank, and the committee have given the small increase of $200 after five years' service. We deem it an act of justice, as they must remain in the service thirteen years before they can get even to the grade of master, owing to the present top-heavy condition of the Navy and the impossibility of any relief. That is all there is of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McPHERSON the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to regulate the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy."

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

The bill (S. 1262) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. CAMERON. I will state that this bill passed the Senate at the last Congress, and I do not see any reason why it should not be passed now. Does the Senator insist upon the report being read?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. CULLOM from the Committee on Naval Affairs April 21, 1886.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill. The hour of half past 12 has arrived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past 12 having arrived, the consideration of the Calendar is suspended, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask that the bill be laid aside for a moment until the Corbin bill be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that pending the river and harbor bill the Senate continue the consideration of the bill before the Senate at half past 12.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand it only requires the reading of the report.

Mr. CAMERON. That is all.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is mistaken. There will be some observations made on it. I am willing the discussion shall proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The case will come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill where we left off yesterday.

RIVER AND HABROR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce in section 1, line 963, to reduce the appropriation for "improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement," from $250,000 to $100,000.

Mr. BECK. When the Senate adjourned yesterday I said that before this amendment was disposed of I desired to say a few words about it. I shall be very brief.

It seems to me there was much misunderstanding yesterday as to the amount of money on hand not needed for contracts already made which is now available for continuing the improvement of the Kentucky River.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] seemed to think that there were still two or three hundred thousand dollars which had not been used, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] seemed to accept that suggestion as correct. They are both on the committee having charge of the bill, and I thought they ought to know if they cared to know, and I believed they were both mistaken. Therefore I went to the office of the Chief of Engineers this morning to ascertain what the real facts were, and I find that every dollar of the money on hand at the date of the last report, except about $90,000, had been paid out before the 1st day of July, 1886, and that contracts for the furnishing of materials for the building of lock No. 6 and for a dam at Beattyville had been made, which will take all or nearly all of that $90,000. I saw a draft this morning in the hands of the Chief of Engineers drawn by Captain Post for $25,000 on that $90,000, with a statement that the materials were coming in so much faster than he had expected and so satisfactorily that all the money on hand would be called for very soon. Yet the gentlemen in charge of the river and harbor bill were insisting on yesterday that there were from two to three hundred thousand dollars now on hand, and they gave that as a reason for striking out a large part of the appropriation for the fiscal year just begun which the House gave.

Mr. President, I am not here to complain or to find fault; but when I went to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in regard to the river and harbor bill and asked to be advised if any adverse action was proposed to be taken in regard to this appropriation, and when the House had given the ordinary appropriation necessary to build one lock, $250,000, and I was assured that I would be duly advised and an opportunity given to show cause why it should not be reduced if any such action was proposed; when I never heard of it till I saw the bill in print and was not advised upon what ground adverse action was had, and was not able to produce the facts, as I could have done and have done this morning by going to the Chief of Engineers and showing that the large sum of money alleged to be on hand was not on hand, but was contracted for and paid out on contracts legitimately made and in process of execution, I think I have some right to complain.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Senator does not mean to say but that from the report of the engineer, which has always been considered, there was only stated what the report shows. There was no information in regard to the present amount on hand before the committee.

Mr. BECK. The committee neither asked the question themselves as to the balance now on hand, nor allowed the representatives of the State an opportunity to know upon what grounds they were going to find fault with what the House had done.

Mr. CONGER. I am not speaking of that——

Mr. BECK. One moment. Information could have been laid before the committee officially that every dollar on hand at the beginning of the year had been expended or contracted for since the old report was made.

Mr. CONGER. I was not on that point. The committee took the annual report and any supplemental reports for their consideration, and they did not go to inquire up to the present hour how the balance has been expended. Therefore there is no occasion for reflections on the committee that they have not in this case, as in other cases, followed them up from the last annual report to the present time.

Mr. BECK. I am reflecting on the committee no further than this, that when the House of Representatives had seen fit to allow $250,000 to this great improvement for this fiscal year, and when I went in person and asked if anything was likely to be done in relation to the appropriation I should be informed of it, and was told that I should be. Was my colleague advised of it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir.

Mr. BECK. I am authorized by my colleague to say for him as well as for myself that neither of us was ever told that the committee intended to strike down the appropriation for this improvement to $100,000. If I had been advised of it—and that is all I propose to say—I should have gone before the committee, as I went to-day to the Chief of Engineers, and would have shown, what seemed to be a matter of great contention yesterday, that every dollar of what the United States engineer officers in charge had on hand a year ago had been carefully and properly expended except $90,000, and contracts had been made for that, against which $25,000 was drawn to-day, and an assurance given that the balance will be needed very soon to pay for materials procured. That much I think I and my colleague ought to have had an opportunity to show. It might have induced the committee to concur in the action of the House.

I have nothing to say against the Senator from Missouri; I know he has fought all these bills, as I did for years, and I know when he talks about the State of Kentucky he does not mean any disrespect to her, and I did not understand him to have meant any. But the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, talked about this great improvement as being a thing that ought to stop. In view of all that has been done in regard to this class of improvements in years gone by, I insist that he is the last man who ought to ask for this reduction after failing to give me the opportunity to state the facts before the committee. He is the last man who ought to complain of this appropriation. He has had not less than $300,000, it may be $500,000, appropriated in these bills since he has been chairman or a member of the committee, to build what were called coffer-dams above the Falls of Saint Anthony to prevent the breaking away of the falls for no other purpose than to help the grist-mills and saw-mills of Minneapolis; this work was all done far above navigation; a 75-foot fall lies right below these coffer-dams. How much money did the Senator get out of the tax-payers of Kentucky and the United States for that?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me to say a word I should like to do so.

Mr. BECK. Not less than $300,000; and that gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is to-day spending millions to dam up lakes 200 miles north of Minneapolis, where there are falls of say 75 feet, for the purpose of increasing the depth of water to float saw-logs down to private mills. He will accomplish that if for no other purpose by the swell in the river when the sluices on the lakes are opened.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. BECK. Well, I did not rise to find fault with these things; but gentlemen who get such appropriations are criticising with a bad grace the action of the State of Kentucky in regard to the improvement of a great river that has been adopted and taken possession of by the Federal Government. The State of Kentucky is absolutely prohibited from touching this river or interfering with the present works after having spent a million dollars upon it; and when an appropriation for only half what the engineers say they want has been given by the House, something better than mere carping ought to be presented as a reason why it should not be done.

The State of Kentucky, in both Houses of Congress, for years and years resisted all local or State improvements in river and harbor bills. As well as she could, she endeavored to go on with her own improvements in her own way, and asked that every other State should do the same thing. We sought to reduce taxes and limit the scope of Federal jurisdiction; nearly all her representatives in Congress took that position; but the Government of the United States saw fit to take possession of the Kentucky River and other great adjuncts to the Ohio and other rivers, and we insist on fair dealing.

The United States improved the Illinois River; they improved the Guyandotte, the Big Kanawha, the Monongahela, and a great many other rivers within the State, and none of them are more important adjuncts to the commerce of the country than the Kentucky River, when this river is improved up to the Three Forks—say 214 miles. There are three great branches—the South, the Middle, and the North Forks—along which, as shown by the reports of the engineers and by the report of Professor Shaler (embodied as part of the engineers' report), there will be obtained a great part of all that is needed in the way of coal, iron, and lumber to supply the whole Ohio and Mississippi Valleys down to New Orleans. The moment the improvement is made all the people of that great valley can be supplied from this region with coal, iron, and lumber as good as can be got in the richest parts of the State of Pennsylvania.

The United States, as I said, after full investigation determined to adopt the improvement of the Kentucky River, and took possession of it in 1879, and has been working at it slowly ever since. It seems to me that having done that, and having taken it out of the hands of the State by Congressional action, and it having been surrendered by the State, as is shown by the act of the Legislature passed in February, 1880, we should not hesitate to give what is needed. If it would not encumber the RECORD, I should be glad to incorporate as part of my remarks what Mr. Fitzhugh and General Merrill have said to Congress officially to show the importance of this work, not only to Kentucky but to all the States that lie below the mouth of the river, in the coal, iron, and lumber to be developed, which can supply the whole Ohio and Mississippi Valleys. The reports are in my hands. They were made in 1880, or rather January 1, 1879, was the first report of Mr. Fitzhugh upon which the United States acted, but I will not take time to read them nor ask them to be copied.

If we had not been required to pay our share of the taxes needed to carry on the improvements of rivers in other States which the United States had undertaken, if we could have taxed the manufactures of our own tobacco (of which we raise 40 per cent. of all that is raised in the United States), if we had been able to tax for State purposes all the whisky manufactured out of the corn and rye produced in the State, if we had been exempted from paying our part of the taxes that the United States imposed upon us for the purpose of making other river and harbor improvements, then there might be something in the complaint made about Kentucky asking that her great river should be improved. But she can not improve it herself; nor can she reduce the taxes she has to pay, she has to rely on Congress because of the action of the United States, and because the Supreme Court has over and over again decided that when the United States takes control all State authority ends. This was settled in a very celebrated case where the Senator from Minnesota was a principal factor by making an appropriation of $15,000 for the harbor of Duluth, which he has taken care to increase again this year, perhaps properly.

I am finding no fault with it. The suit grew out of an improvement made by Duluth illegally cutting through Minnesota point a broad channel or canal, which changed the current of the Saint Louis river where the natural mouth of the harbor was the dividing line between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota. The officials of that town opened a new channel to the lake; they did it secretly, they did it wrongfully, they did it at the dictation of Mr. Jay Cooke and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. All their acts were admitted to have been in violation of law. Yet the moment the Committee on Commerce appropriated $15,000 to improve the inner harbor of Duluth, after wasting a half a million in an attempt to improve the outer harbor on the lake, the original wrong ceased to be considered, and in the case of The State of Wisconsin vs. Duluth the Supreme Court decided that the action of Congress, in making that appropriation and recognizing it after that canal was illegally cut through, legalized the whole proceedings, and from that time on all the improvements of the inner harbor belonged to the United States, and neither Wisconsin nor Minnesota nor the court could interfere, because the very fact of making an appropriation was the adoption of the work to the exclusion of other rights and claims, and therefore justified every wrong that had been previously committed—at least to the extent of making it impossible for the court to interfere. I have the decision here in 6 Otto, page 386, with which the Senator from Minnesota is perfectly familiar.

Now after seven years have passed since the United States took the Kentucky River, and after we have no longer the power to improve the river by State authority so as to reach the point where the coal, the iron, and the lumber are in such abundance as to supply the wants of the whole Ohio and Mississippi Valley, when we can not touch the works on the river, when they must remain useless and block up our trade on it forever unless the United States abandons it altogether and gives it back to us, which nobody proposes or desires, why should not at least this ordinary appropriation which has been given for years be retained in the bill? That is the plain, practical question.

I am not finding fault particularly with what has been done in regard to appropriations for other States. I mentioned the cases in Minnesota to show that they will not bear criticism half as well as this appropriation for the Kentucky River. The chairman of the committee, when he comes to examine this question fairly and compare it with others, will find very little good reason for this reduction, especially as the engineers insist and prove that it requires $250,000 to complete one lock, and thus extend navigation 15 or 20 miles farther. Unless they get this much they can not finish even one, for which they say there is a good deal of material now on hand or contracted for.

I may add in regard to the title, which was criticised yesterday, that I saw to-day in the office of the Chief of Engineers the opinion of the Attorney-General that the title to the ground where lock No. 6 is located was entirely satisfactory, and the property has been conveyed to the United States. Our officers are now using it. That was not settled when the last report was made. The land was obtained upon reasonable terms and the work is now going on. The absence of a good title was commented on yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota. He may dismiss that apprehension. My colleague has been managing this matter; he has done it very well. It was only because I came on the floor of the Senate yesterday and made the remark I did about the facts not being all stated that I felt it necessary to enter into the debate to-day. To be sure that I was right I went this morning to see the reports in the office of the Chief of Engineers.

I have not been paying attention to this bill. I happened to come in from the Committee on Appropriations, where I have been busy for the last four days, almost night and day, on the subcommittee on the sundry civil bill, and heard the criticism of the Senator from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, and was a good deal annoyed because I was not allowed to present the facts to the committee, as I thought he promised I should be if needed; therefore I felt it my duty to say what I have on this subject. At first, I confess to feeling a little annoyed at the criticism of my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but when I began to reason coolly and look at it I got over it. I knew that if the State of Kentucky has a son that is proud of her and that she is proud of, he is the man. I had not the heart to say a word about anything he said, because I know he does not mean anything disrespectful to the old State.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky has suffered anything at my hands for want of information by him in regard to the proceedings before the committee, I sincerely regret it. If he did not receive the information, whether I had promised to give it to him or not, I would regret it exceedingly, for there is no Senator upon this floor for whom I have more respect. There is no Senator for the interests of whose State I would do more. I would much regret if any misadventure should have transpired in regard to any matter connected with his State by his want of information in regard to the action of the committee. If the Senator from Kentucky was not advised, as he says he was not, of the proceedings of the committee, it was certainly through inadvertence, for I had the pleasure of meeting the Senator in the committee-room several times and supposed that he was advised of all that was transpiring there affecting his State. Certainly I should not have permitted him to remain in ignorance of anything that transpired in regard to his State if I could have avoided it.

In reference to this improvement the Senator has certainly misunderstood the tenor of my remarks. I did not criticise the character of the improvement at all. It was only with reference to the amount of expenditure to be appropriated for at this time and in this bill that my remarks were made.

There is an improvement above the point designated as the Three Forks.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no improvement contemplated above the Three Forks.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are other locks and dams to be constructed upon the river above that portion of it which is now in process of improvement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. And the object of my remarks was to endeavor to confine the attention of the Senate to the improvement going on now until it was completed, and then an appropriation may be made, if deemed advisable, for the extension of the locks and dams and the slack-water navigation. I made no objection to the plan of improving the river; and if the Senator understood me to do so, it was certainly a misunderstanding.

Now, with reference to the amount available and in the hands of the War Department, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has stated correctly the sources of our information. We obtained it from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers. The last annual report states that on the 1st of July, 1884, the amount available was $74,452.06, and the amount appropriated by the act of July 5, 1884, was $250,000, making $324,452.06 which was available after the 5th of July, 1884. Then the report for 1885 succeeds that. The amount expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, exclusive of outstanding liabilities July 1, 1884, was $59,730.26, leaving the amount available on the 1st of July, 1885, $234,721.80.

That was the amount reported by the Chief of Engineers as being available at that time, and that was the statement made in the Senate yesterday in regard to that balance. The Senator from Kentucky has communicated this morning with the Engineer Department and he has learned of the disposition of this balance up to to-day, and it seems from that information that a portion of this $264,721.80 has been expended in materials and supplies to carry forward this improvement.

In addition to that there are $90,000 which will soon be expended, as I understood the statement of the Senator from Kentucky who has just taken his seat; so that they have the material and supplies on hand for the work this year and the $90,000 remaining, or they have the cash. Substantially then there are in materials and supplies and cash the balance, $264,721.80, on hand for the work for the fiscal year for which we are appropriating.

That was all the statement that was made here. That was all we intended to say. If that is not the correct statement, I should be very glad to be corrected by either of the Senators from Kentucky.

If that be so, if these materials are on hand, and this cash balance still ready to be applied, we thought the appropriation of $100,000 in addition to that would be sufficient for the expenditures of the next fiscal year. That was the view the committee had. It was actuated by no hostility to this improvement. It was not because the committee thought the work should not go forward; but it was only as to how much should be appropriated in view of the amount of this bill and the circumstances surrounding the case, we all desiring to pass an appropriation for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, and that the Kentucky River should have its proper proportion of the amount.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this matter any further. Yesterday afternoon, as the RECORD of the Senate will show, I stated this whole case, and I stated it fairly and fully.

There were but two propositions upon which the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Missouri rested the grounds of their opposition to the clause as contained in the bill. The one was that there was still unexpended in the hands of the engineer $264,000. Against that statement, which I assumed to be correct and carefully prepared when it was made by two Senators members of the Committee on Commerce, I file now the official statement of the engineer, a statement bearing date this morning, which says:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of this date in reference to the appropriation for the improvement of the Kentucky River, and in reply beg to say that the balance in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of that appropriation is $90,000, and that of this sum $25,000 will be sent to the officer in charge of the work, in compliance with his estimate, to meet obligations incurred or about to be incurred during the present month. The actual amount available may therefore be stated at $65,000. What proportion of this sum is pledged under contract for work in progress can not be ascertained without communicating with the officer in charge of the work.

The estimated sum that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is $500,000, as may be seen by reference to the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1885, pages 288 and 289.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. PARKE,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

Hon. J. C. S. BLACKBURN,
United States Senate.

I put this statement against the assurance given us by the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Missouri yesterday.

In addition to that, I have this day the verbal assurance of the Chief of Engineers that he does not believe there is a dollar left of the $65,000 that is not already pledged by reason of work done and contracts made. It may be very ingenious for the Senator from Minnesota to undertake to shift his ground, and now hold, as he does this morning, that if the sum of $264,000 is not there, unexpended material has been bought which is not yet used and represents it. That is not the statement of the Chief of Engineers; that is not the statement made by my colleague this morning; and the inference drawn by the Senator from Minnesota is not fairly to be deduced either from the statements of the one or the other.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I should like the Senator to state what the facts are in regard to that matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will tell the Senator, for it is very late in the day for him to be getting information upon as important a subject as this. The facts are simply these: The difference between the $264,000 that appeared to be on hand twelve months or more ago (which is the latest date of the Senator's information it appears) and the $65,000 actually on hand to-day is represented by work that has been done in the last twelve months and paid for, by material that has been bought in the last twelve months and paid for and used, and by services rendered by the employed force that is engaged upon this work. That is the truth.

I was interrogated more than once yesterday by more than one Senator as to whether in point of fact there had ever been any deed of cession made of this property to the United States Government. The Senator from Vermont called for the statute of my State that made a cession of this property. For his information and for the information of others who may be curious upon the subject I have it in my hand. It was approved on the 22d day of March, 1880, and I read the whole of it, leaving out the enacting clause.

SEC. 1. That these words contained in the first section of the act named in the title to this act, and to which it is an amendment, to wit: "Concurrently with the State of Kentucky," be, and are hereby, stricken out and repealed, and that these words be inserted therein in lieu of the same.

Here is the statute, and the whole of it.

It is the object and intention of this act, and of the one amended and altered by it, to confer on the United States Government full title to the grounds and sites therein named and acquired, or to be acquired under them, and all power, authority, and jurisdiction over the same which the said Government of the United States may, under the Constitution of the United States and laws made in pursuance thereof, acquire over lands in the State ceded to it for the purpose of canalizing, locking, and damming rivers, and making canals, and to enable it to operate, manage, and control said improvements efficiently; but the State of Kentucky reserves the right to execute process lawfully issued under its authority within and upon said grounds, sites, rivers, and canals: Provided, That the act to which this is an amendment apply only to the Kentucky River, and the said act is so amended.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved March 22, 1880.

Let us see whether the Federal Government understood that it was taking up the contract as stated by the Senator from Missouri. He answered an interrogatory of mine yesterday afternoon and said it was his distinct understanding that the Federal Government never undertook a contract to do more or to go further than to improve this river by repairing the five locks and dams already built by the State upon it and not to go beyond a distance of 163 miles, to the Three Forks. Let us see. Here is the river and harbor act passed February 27, 1879, making appropriations for the succeeding fiscal year, passed a year before the deed of cession was made, and it reads:

For improving the Kentucky River from the mouth to Three Forks, according to estimate and report of Maj. William E. Merrill, January 14, 1879, $100,000.

That was not all. Here is the report upon which they predicated it. From the mouth to Three Forks is 261 miles. No man has ever yet intimated a purpose of improving it beyond Three Forks.

That was the act of 1879, and here is the act of 1880, after this deed of cession was passed. I find in the river and harbor act of 1880 this singular language, and I plead it in answer to the statement and construction of the contract given by the Senator from Missouri:

Improving Kentucky River from its mouth to Three Forks: Continuing operations, $200,000.

Mr. VEST. What act was that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I read from the river and harbor acts of 1879 and 1880.

Mr. VEST. How much was appropriated; $200,000?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Two hundred thousand dollars is the act of 1880 and $100,000 in the act of 1879; but in both instances the Government expressly states its purpose and gives its own construction to the contract, which it says was to improve that river from the mouth to Three Forks. That is all we are now proposing to do or ever will propose to do.

Mr. President, I am content to submit that the objection as to the want of cession of title is answered by this law and by these general appropriation acts and their peculiar language. The question as to whether the amount that may be on hand unexpended is certainly answered in the official statement made this day by the Chief of Engineers. I do not know what ground is left for opposition to this proposition, for the Chief of Engineers in this official letter to-day says the estimated sum that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year is $500,000, as per his report and his estimate. That is what he asks. The House cut it in half, and the bill came here in that shape, and the committee of the Senate deliberately undertook to strike out $150,000 from the $250,000 that was left after the butchery the House did to it.

I am content, sir, to leave the case for the Senate to determine, assured that there is not now a single objection submitted by any one upon the other side that has not been refuted by the official records of the Government.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that he received the impression yesterday that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and myself stated that we knew, or, to use his own language, that he had the assurance from us that there was $264,000 of the former appropriation now in the hands of the engineers for the Kentucky River. I will read from the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, and I should then like to know from the Senator from Kentucky how he arrived at any such conclusion:

Mr. VEST. We have a right to judge the future by the past. The same Engineer Bureau will spend the money in about the same way as heretofore. In 1883 they had $250,000, and on July 1, 1884, they had $74,452, which they were not able to spend. In 1884 we gave them $250,000 more, making $324,452; and on July 1, 1885, they had available $264,721. Now they come in and ask for $500,000 and say they can expend it. We have a right to suppose that they will have about an equal balance left next July.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator undertake to state to the Senate that there are $250,000 of unexpended appropriations for this river now?

Mr. VEST. I do not know how much is on hand. There was nothing before the Committee on Commerce to show what was on hand. We have got these figures and these figures alone. If there is any subsequent or supplemental report, where is it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If it would not interrupt the Senator, as he is reading from his own remarks, I should like to call his attention to one sentence of his own found in the RECORD. If the Senator from Missouri did not mean to assure the Senate that the engineers had this amount of money on hand, I should like for him to explain this one sentence which I quote from the RECORD from him:

They must have on hand at a reasonable estimate $240,000 at least.

Is not that an assurance?

Mr. VEST. Upon the figures before us, I say that was the logical deduction; but I stated expressly in answer to the Senator from Kentucky that we had nothing else to go by except the figures that were given us in the report of the engineer. Now, the two Senators from Kentucky have gone to the Engineer Bureau and ascertained that instead of my estimate alone, not based upon any information or finding except the figures that were before us, instead of $240,000 there was $90,000 unexpended of the former appropriations. That is the whole of it.

The Senator from Kentucky speaks of the contract. The act of the Legislature of Kentucky which he has read was no contract; it was simply the ordinary cession by the State of Kentucky of her right in the small amount of land necessary for the construction of locks and dams to the United States, saving her criminal jurisdiction or right to execute process thereon. There was in that act of the Legislature no contract between the United States and the State of Kentucky. The only contract is contained in the river and harbor act of 1879, which is in this language:

For improving the Kentucky River from the mouth to Three Forks, according to estimate and report of Maj. William E. Merrill, January 14, 1879, $100,000.

No other contract can be found between the State of Kentucky and the United States. Now mark the language: "Improving the Kentucky River" up "to Three Forks, according to estimate and report." What was that estimate from Maj. William E. Merrill? Here is his report. This is the contract between the United States and the State of Kentucky, and what was that estimate? "For repair of the five locks and dams now on the river, $84,802; for twelve more locks and dams, $989,600." Making in all, $1,074,402.

The United States agreed to expend that amount of money and not one dollar more, $1,074,402, and yet in the estimate now made by the same Engineer Bureau we have the amount estimated required for the completion of existing project, $2,229,639.26. After expending $575,000 before, more than one-half of the amount of the estimate which the United States agreed to expend upon this river, they now come in and ask us to put upon it $2,229,639.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from Missouri answer and say whether it is an unusual thing for a work of this magnitude to cost more than the original estimate put upon it?

Mr. VEST. That does not meet this point at all. The Senator from Kentucky talked about a contract. Here is the only contract in existence. That contract says that this work shall be done upon the estimate made by Major Merrill January 14, 1879.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator answer me one question? Does he not admit now that he was wrong yesterday when he said the Government never intended to go beyond the repair of five locks, and under this contract as he described it yesterday (and I only accepted it as a term of convenience), does he not admit that now, according to his own interpretation of the contract, the Government stands committed to the building of twelve new locks and dams?

Mr. VEST. I was not upon the Commerce Committee in 1878 and 1879. I went upon that committee in the spring of 1880. If I had been on the committee I would certainly have resisted this item, as I have resisted all similar items in every river and harbor bill since I have served upon the committee.

If it is any consolation to the Senator from Kentucky, I will admit that I overlooked the fact that these twelve locks and dams were put into this project of Major Merrill's, but the main and salient point remains unchanged, and that is that the United States Government limited the amount of expenditure to be put upon the Kentucky River; and these same engineers now come in and instead of $1,074,000 they ask for $2,229,000 in addition to the $575,000 already expended.

If anything in my manner or in my language has subjected me to the criticism of being inimical toward this project or to the Senator from Kentucky I have been most unfortunate in that manner and in that expression; but I am opposed to this whole system of States or individuals going into these speculative works of internal improvement, and after they find that they have not paid, that there is no dividend in them, that the railroads of the country have done away with the old canal and slack-water navigation, then unload upon the people of the United States the result of their own improvidence and folly.

I say this the more frankly because every association of childhood, of early manhood, and down to death itself, has been and will be linked indissolubly with the State of Kentucky. I was born and reared in it. If it were my own State I would denounce this same project. It is undemocratic, it is extravagant, it is a waste of the public money of the country, and under our oaths we have no right to do it. A proud and glorious old Commonwealth ought not to have asked it. I for one regret that this subject is here to-day with this contract made between her and the United States, and yet coming here and asking for millions more than the contract originally provided for.

Mr. INGALLS. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to this bill, and I ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the amendment be read. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Insert on page 59, in line 1438, after the word "channel:"

"And provided further, That the expenditure of so much of said appropriation as may be required to continue the improvement of Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches shall be confined to the complete repair and maintenance of the levees throughout said reaches to the height of 2 feet above the flood of 1882, and to the completion of the permeable works of contraction to such extent as may be required to bring the high-water banks of the river to the comparative uniformity of width contemplated in the first five paragraphs of "the plan of improvement" recommended by the Mississippi River Commission, and adopted by Congress in 1880, and more fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of War for 1881, volume 2, part 3, page 2733: And provided further, That no works of bank protection or revetment shall be executed in said reaches or elsewhere until after it shall be found that the completion of the permeable contracting works and uniform width of the high-water channel will not secure the desired stability of the river banks: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the construction of revetment works in front of the cities of Memphis, Hickman, Columbus, and Greenville reach: And provided, That contraction works shall be built at the same time in the wide portions of the river immediately above the said revetment works."

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will accept and adopt that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not now under consideration. The proposed amendment will be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the clerks will use celerity in having the amendment printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce reducing the appropriation for improving the Kentucky River from $250,000 to $100,000.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that in reference to the amendment touching the Kentucky River, the issue presented by the Senator from Missouri does not seem to me to be reached by the suggestion of the committee to limit the amount of the appropriation. The question as to whether one or twenty-five locks and dams shall be built on that river is not at all affected by the question whether the Senate shall adopt or reject the amendment proposed by the committee.

Improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement—

As the House proposes—

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement—

As the Senate committee proposes—

One hundred thousand dollars.

Whether the amendment of the Senate committee be adopted or rejected the appropriation made by the bill will be an appropriation to continue that work precisely as it has been in progress, so that so far as the pending amendment is concerned the question is simply one of amount.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me, I refer him to the report of the engineers, which shows what the work will be for the current fiscal year.

Mr. KENNA. I have read the report of the engineers, and I have to-day satisfied myself in regard to this matter about which I confess there may be some difficulty, because I am in full accord with the spirit and general purposes of the committee in regard to the bill. I went myself to-day to see the Chief of Engineers. Not finding him, I saw General Parke, acting chief, in reference to this whole subject. So far as the reports are concerned there is nothing in those reports, and there is nothing in this bill, and there is nothing in any bill which has passed Congress which specifically directs the expenditure of this money with reference to the improvement of a certain part of the river or a certain other part, except the limitation of the first act from its mouth to Three Forks. So this matter stands upon the naked question as to whether we shall appropriate one amount or another amount in this bill.

As I said, I am in full accord with the general spirit and purposes of the committee in its effort to revise this bill, to suggest amendments, and to perfect it. I believe I have not antagonized the committee on a single proposition on which the Senate has voted. I am informed, however, at the Department that substantially every dollar of money heretofore appropriated for this work has either been expended or is engaged for expenditure. Some material it is true is on hand. Some material must be on hand or the works must cease. Works of this character are done partly by day's labor under the direction of governmental agencies and partly by contract for the construction of either a lock or a dam, and an amount sufficient for the whole of it must be in hand, or the whole of it must be available as an amount appropriated. In my judgment, unless a larger sum is appropriated for this work than $100,000 its progress will retarded, and it will suffer in the course of the current fiscal year.

What difference does it make, if the work be meritorious; if it be, as I believe, and as I think the committee believe, not only a meritorious but a very important work, that we appropriate the larger amount? The amount to be expended must be expended in the progress of the work either now or hereafter. If we are in a condition to appropriate the amount of money now to carry it on in about the order and the rate of speed at which the work has been progressing, in about the general manner in which public works over the country have been progressing, what difference does it make to the Treasury, to the people, or to this bill if we put in an amount of money sufficient for that purpose?

I shall vote for retaining the appropriation in the bill as the House left it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] on all general questions, but I have the permission of his colleague [Mr. CHACE] to vote on this question. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MILLER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. HEARST. My colleague [Mr. STANFORD] is absent, but understanding that my colleague would vote "nay," I vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator's colleague told me this morning that he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Cameron,	Evarts,	Logan,	Teller,

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 968, after the word "improvement," to strike out—

According to the last plan of the engineer in charge, and to be first applied to the completion of the work now in progress.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving the Falls of the Ohio River, at Louisville, Ky.: Continuing improvement, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 971 of section 1, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That of that sum $50,000 shall be expended in enlarging the canal basin, as recommended in the last report of the engineer in charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 975, after the words "directed to," to strike out "negotiate for the purchase" and insert "ascertain the value and commercial importance;" in line 976, after the word "works," to insert "and property;" in line 981, after the words "in order to," to strike out "ascertain the value of said works" and insert "acquire such information;" in line 982, after the words "appoint a," to strike out "commission" and insert "board;" in line 984, after the word "Army," to strike out "who" and insert "which board shall;" in line 985, after the word "case," to strike out "shall value and appraise the same, and;" in line 986, after the word "report," to insert "thereon;" and in line 987, after the word "session," to strike out "and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this provision" and insert "and the cost of such examination shall be paid out of the sum appropriated by this act for surveys;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the value and commercial importance of the works and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company, situated on the Green and Barren Rivers, in the State of Kentucky, and the works of the Monongahela Navigation Company, situated on the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania; and in order to acquire such information the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of three competent engineers from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, which board shall in each case report to the Secretary of War, who shall report thereon to Congress at its next succeeding session; and the cost of such examination shall be paid out of the sum appropriated by this act for surveys: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as committing Congress to the purchase of the said works.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, to strike out the clause from line 994 to line 1023 inclusive, as follows:

Improvement of the Muskingum River, Ohio, between Zanesville and the mouth of the river, and for operating the same, $20,000. And the United States hereby accepts from the State of Ohio the said Muskingum River improvement, and all the locks, dams, and their appurtenances, and the canals belonging to said improvement, and all the franchises and property of every kind, and rights, in said river, and its improvements, now owned, held, and enjoyed by the State of Ohio, including all water leases and rights to use water under and by virtue of any lease of water now running and in force between the State of Ohio and all persons using said water, hereby intending to transfer to the United States such rights in said leases and contracts as are now owned, held, or reserved by the State of Ohio; but not to affect any right to the use of the water of said river now owned and held by the lessees of any water right under any lease or contract with the State of Ohio. And the United States hereby assumes control of said river, subject to the paramount interest of navigation. The provisions of this act, so far as they relate to the Muskingum River, shall not take effect, nor shall the money hereby appropriated be available, until the State of Ohio, acting by its duly authorized agent, turns over to the United States all property ceded by the act of the General Assembly aforesaid, and all personal property belonging to the improvement aforesaid, and used in its care and improvement, and any balance of money appropriated by said State for the improvement of said river, and which is not expended on the 15th day of July, 1886.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am very sorry to have to detain the Senate upon this amendment, because I supposed that this clause of the bill would probably meet with less opposition than any other in the bill. But as the Committee on Commerce has proposed to strike it out, it is necessary for me to explain it, so that the Senate may understand precisely the nature of the appropriation.

This proposition to transfer the Muskingum improvement by the State of Ohio to the United States has been considered by every branch of the Government. The engineers report in favor of it in the strongest language. It has been considered elsewhere, to use the common phrase—though I do not see any reason why we should not state openly what has been done in the House of Representatives; I do not think there is anything in the rule forbidding it—it has been fully considered elsewhere, when after debate it was adopted as a just and proper measure.

Let me state to the Senate, if I can secure their attention, what is the nature of this improvement. Forty years ago; yes, fifty years ago, the State of Ohio undertook to improve the only navigable stream within the State by a series of locks and dams. At that time the Government of the United States refused to improve either rivers or harbors. A policy had been adopted by common consent that the United States would make no appropriations for improvements. So the State of Ohio undertook to improve the Muskingum River.

The Muskingum River drains about one-fifth of the State of Ohio. It is the only navigable stream within that State. It is a large stream extending from the Ohio River at Marietta to within 25 miles of the lake at Cleveland, and draining all the eastern part of the State except that which is tributary to the Ohio River.

It is therefore a stream of great importance. It has always been navigated since the earliest occupation of the State of Ohio by white settlers precisely like the Ohio River, with batteaux, with keel-boats, and with every mode of navigation known to the early settlers. It was navigated by the Indians. This beautiful valley was the favorite home of the Indian tribes, several of which lived on the waters of the Muskingum.

The United States Government however refusing and declining at the time to make any improvement on any river or harbor, the State of Ohio undertook it, and spent one million six hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars in making eight or ten locks and dams, which made a good navigable stream from Zanesville to Marietta, a distance of 65½ miles, and a tolerable navigation for 10 or 15 miles above to Dresden.

That property has ever since been managed by the State of Ohio. It has always been the policy of that State to levy tolls upon its public works, both canals and slack-water improvements of this kind, only sufficient to pay the actual cost of maintaining the work without any expectation of profit. In that way the State of Ohio has imposed tolls upon the navigation of the Muskingum River, very low tolls, but sufficient in the aggregate to pay the expenses of its maintenance. Until within the last two or three years that policy has been successful, but owing to the well-known high freshets within the last two years on the Ohio and its tributaries there was a great deal of damage done to the work, so that the expenses for two or three years were greater than the receipts.

However, the river is a useful, navigable stream, having a large and important commerce—boats running from one end to the other daily, and many boats at intermediate points. Taking the single item of coal, 330,000 tons of coal pass over this Muskingum improvement in the course of a year. A toll of 10 cents a ton on that coal would amount to far more than the expenses would be; but, as I said, the State of Ohio never levied any such toll, but only levied fairly enough, about $10,000 to $15,000 a year, in order to maintain and pay current expenses of this improvement.

A year or two ago, the State of Ohio having leased most of her improvements, canals, &c., to private companies, by whom it was believed they would be conducted better, it was proposed that this improvement, which was the only improvement of its character under the charge of the State, the only navigable stream in the State, should be transferred to the General Government, not to sell it to the Government, not to ask money, not to ask the United States to pay back the $1,600,000 that the locks and dams cost, but to give it absolutely as a free gift to the Government of the United States, and the State appropriated in addition to this offer $10,000 for its repair and improvement until this matter might be consummated. The object was to transfer it to the Government of the United States so that it might be treated like any other improvement conducted by the Government, like all the improvements of all the rivers and navigable harbors and streams of the United States.

Mr. President, I can not see the least objection to this proposition. I am informed by the members of the Committee on Commerce that the objection made in committee was that according to the report of the engineers it would cost $200,000 to put this improvement in perfect repair. Suppose it did cost $200,000 to put in repair a work that cost $1,600,000 fifty years ago, is it not right that this the only navigable stream in the State of Ohio should be treated as favorably at least as those streams which have been improved entirely by the National Government? Certainly; and if it did cost $200,000 it is no reason why it should not be granted, because in this very bill there are given to improve rivers of far less volume and far less importance $100,000 and $200,000.

There is the river Kanawha, which is across the way on the south side of the Ohio, all of which has been improved entirely by the Government of the United States. There is in the bill an appropriation of $25,000 for that river. The committee which had charge of the bill, not satisfied with what the House gave, increased the amount $100,000. I have no objection to that if it was found necessary; but if the Kanawha on the other side and the Monongahela at the head of the Ohio should be, as proposed by this bill, purchased outright of a private company and the cost of it reimbursed to that private company, or the Wisconsin company that we heard so much talk about, where we buy out and pay them the full amount of their expenditure with interest added, why should not the modest claim of the State of Ohio be accepted that she would give this improvement to the United States if the United States would take it and do with it as they did by their own improvements made upon other rivers out of the Treasury of the United States?

But this bugbear of $200,000 is fallacious when we come to read the report of the engineer; and my friend from Minnesota will bear with me. It is true the engineer does say that to put this property in good complete condition, being eight or ten locks and canals, for new miters, new walls of certain kinds, would cost $200,000; but he does not recommend the $200,000 to be immediately appropriated. He says to put it into immediate condition, the best possible condition, would cost $200,000. But it is not necessary to do that. He estimates that to put the harbor of New York in good condition would cost $10,000,000, yet we only appropriate $1,000,000. So that the $200,000, if it costs that much, could be appropriated at the rate of $20,000 a year, and in ten years be put in good condition.

But the mistake into which the committee have fallen is that they have grossly exaggerated the amount that even the engineer estimates. The engineer estimates that the cost of putting this property into condition from Marietta to Dresden, some 20 miles north of Zanesville, will be $200,000; but the chief injury done by one of the great freshets was on the dam that lies between Dresden and Zanesville, and therefore it was that the State of Ohio in deeding this property to the General Government does not propose to deed that which is not useful to them, but only proposes to deed that between Zanesville and Marietta, and the estimate of the engineer for the improvement of that part of it is only $114,000.

If the committee had actually proposed to appropriate the $114,000 by this bill, it would be, in my judgment, one of the most judicious and defensible appropriations they could put in the bill; because it is only a bagatelle compared with other items. The Government would receive a property which cost $1,600,000, and which could not be built now for less than $3,000,000, which was built at a time when money was money, which was built at a time when the credit of the State was stretched to its uttermost to maintain internal improvements, and when its 6 per cent. bonds were sold below par. It is proposed to give this property outright, the only navigable river in the State, to the Government, and ask no refund, ask no sale; all that we ask is that the Government of the United States shall take this property and manage it as they do other improvements of this kind.

It might be asked, why does Ohio desire to get rid of this property? I have already partly answered that by saying that Ohio has no corps of engineers employed in her service to take care of this improvement. Besides that, the policy of Ohio has always been to make her improvements pay at least the cost and expenses of maintenance, and this is a burden upon the people of the neighborhood. Why should the farmers of the Muskingum Valley pay toll for every bushel of wheat and the miners for every ton of coal passing through and over that improvement when on all the other navigable streams of the United States there is no toll to be found anywhere where the flag floats and where the Government owns the property?

Therefore this is proposed to be done in order to get rid of this system of tolls, to place this property under the custody and surveillance of skilled engineers, to see that our people might get the benefit of that general policy which has now been adopted by the Government, and I hope permanently adopted, by which the rivers and harbors of the country shall be improved so far as it is profitable to improve them. All that our people ask is that when this property is received by the United States Government it shall be managed and conducted precisely like all the other improvements made under this bill; that it shall be free from toll.

But it is said it will cost something. So it will. It will cost the Government of the United States $20,000 a year according to the estimate of the engineer, and $20,000 is appropriated by the bill as it passed the House. It will not cost that much this year, because Ohio turns over with this gift, according to the language of the law, $10,000, appropriated this year, besides the improvement itself. It will cost the Government $20,000 a year, and perhaps in the course of time it will cost the $114,000 in addition to put the locks and dams in a higher and better state of improvement than they ever were probably from the beginning; because when you put a United States engineer at work on one of these public improvements he makes it complete, he makes it perfect. He is not satisfied with the kind of work that was satisfactory to the engineers of the State of Ohio fifty years ago. In this way we would get the benefit of this improvement made by turning over this property to the General Government, so that the Government of the United States might treat it as it does all the rest of the improvements made by it.

Mr. President, I do not see any reason for the action of the committee. I do not blame them at all, because they probably did not examine this matter. They were startled probably by the fact that this might cost $200,000, but that estimate of the engineer was only as to what might be profitably expended, just as he makes estimates in regard to the whole bill that there might be profitably expended $45,000,000 this year, when nobody proposes to give him any such sum and when this provision does not propose to give him the full amount. Indeed I do not think any more is necessary than the bare sums sufficient to keep and maintain the work.

I say that this is a matter of justice, it is a matter of fair play, it is a matter of honor. As Ohio was the first to undertake the improvement of a navigable stream, it ought not to suffer thereby. No other State did it. With the exception of the improvement made in the Monongahela River, I do not know that any other State has made these improvements on navigable streams, and that was made by a company for profit. This bill contains an appropriation to buy out that private company so as to make the Monongahela free of toll. So with the appropriation contained in the bill to buy the canal at Sturgeon Bay, so that that great channel of communication might be made free of toll. So with the improvement of the Kentucky River. Kentucky undertook to build four or five dams on the Kentucky River. She abandoned it and turned it over to the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States properly assumed the care and custody of that river. This improvement or transfer of the Muskingum ought to have been made to the Government long ago in order to have placed this river upon the same footing as others.

I do not want to go back to my constituents and tell them that I voted for a bill that bought from private companies for large sums of money all sorts of canals and schemes in all parts of the country, when the Senate refused to accept as a gift from the State of Ohio a property that cost that State $1,600,000 fifty years ago. I think it would be unjust and wrong. All that we ask is not favor, not bounty, not even equity, not even equality, but that the Muskingum, the only river navigable in our State, shall be free from toll, just like the Alabama River and every other river improved by the Government of the United States is now free from toll, and that the property of our people, their coal, their iron, and all the productions of that beautiful valley may pass untaxed to market without any toll.

We pay our full share of the burdens of this bill. The State of Ohio according to computation pays nearly one-twelfth of all the taxes of the United States. Therefore according to our wealth and property we would pay for this bill about $1,600,000, and we freely pay it. Our representatives vote for these river and harbor bills, although we are only interested in those harbors that are on Lake Erie on our northern boundary and such improvement as may be made along our southern boundary on the Ohio River. This is the only river in which we have undertaken to make an improvement, and upon which we ask the United States Government not to make the improvement but to receive it as made from us, and to keep it in good order and to give us the benefit of freedom from tolls.

I ask the Senate, therefore, not to agree to the amendment proposed by the committee, but that the provision may stand as in the bill.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I will take the Senator into my confidence so far as to say that I do not think any sort of opposition to anything proposed to be put back into the bill will avail anything. When a committee which reports a bill is found with one-half of its members refusing to vote or else voting with the opponents of the bill, it is a foregone conclusion, and it goes without saying, that that bill is in the hands of its enemies, and will be constructed as they seek to construct it, and not as its friends seek to make it.

When I vote for a bill in committee I consider myself enlisted in its defense except as to some special feature in regard to which I reserve my action in the Senate. I am simply now performing a duty which I consider incumbent upon me, without the slightest hope of making the bill what I think it should be. It came to the Senate with about $15,000,000 appropriated. We have increased it in committee (and I shall say nothing about the individual action of members) $3,400,000. It will go out of the Senate appropriating in the neighborhood of $20,000,000. If it were not for the Mississippi River that is provided for in it I should vote against it. I can not vote against that single appropriation, and with that iron hand around my throat I may vote for the bill, but I do it under a solemn protest.

This whole system, as I have said heretofore, of unloading upon the Treasury of the United States old played-out systems of internal improvement is wrong. It was wrong in Kentucky, it is wrong in Ohio, it is wrong in Illinois. When those great States went into such improvements they took the chances as to whether they would pay or not. They have received all the benefit of the improvement of the country, if there has been any, and doubtless there has been, and now when the railroad system of the country has supplanted the canals and the old systems of internal improvement, they come and say that the Treasury of the United States must take the result of their own imprudence, if not folly.

The Senator from Ohio says that the great State of Ohio is donating to the people of the United States a work that cost $1,628,000 forty-six years ago. I ask the Senator as a business man the plain question, if upon the statement he has made here, and that the engineer makes here, any private citizen or corporation could be induced to take this work at any price?

Mr. SHERMAN. With the power to levy tolls?

Mr. VEST. Even with the power to levy tolls.

Mr. SHERMAN. Indeed he would.

Mr. VEST. Who would put a dollar into it? Look at the statement of the engineer. The canal is in a ruinous condition. The State of Ohio only expends barely enough upon it to enable boats to pass through it. The engineer, who the Senator says has given a strong report in favor of this provision, sums up the whole argument in these words:

> To sum up, it will require an immediate appropriation of $200,000 to put the locks and dams on the Muskingum River in good order. A small dredge-boat will be required, at an estimated cost of $5,000; the annual expenditures will be $25,000 for repairs, $8,500 for salaries, and $2,500 for dredging; the annual income from rents will be $4,000. The net annual cost of maintaining navigation on the Muskingum River will therefore be $32,000.

I consider myself here a trustee for the people of this country or I should not be here at all. If I propose to transact business for the people of this country upon a different basis from that upon which I act as a trustee for a private corporation, I am unfit to hold my office on this floor.

Here we are asked to put down $200,000 to commence with; and I undertake to say it will be a far larger amount, as we all know from the estimates of the Engineer Bureau. It is $200,000 to start with, and then, according to the estimate of the engineer who favors this project, it will be a clear net loss of $32,000 a year from that time on.

This is asked on behalf of the third State in the Union. The third State in the Union comes and says to the people of the United States, "We propose now to put upon you an improvement; no matter what it cost in the beginning, it will cost you $200,000, to commence with, to put it into repair, so that you can use it at all, and then $32,000 a year from the public Treasury each recurring year."

I said that the old canal and slack-water navigation system had gone out before the railroads of the country. If Senators will take the trouble, although it is a waste of time to look at the map, they will find that the Muskingum runs from Dresden down to Zanesville and then from Zanesville down to Marietta, on the Ohio River. I am informed (and the Senator from Ohio knows whether it is true or not) that the portion of the improvement from Dresden to Zanesville, amounting to 16 miles, was abandoned years ago, and the cause of this abandonment was that a railroad was constructed between those two points. A railroad is now being constructed from Zanesville to Marietta, and one-third of it will be in operation in a very short time. It runs down the Muskingum Valley.

Does not every sensible and intelligent man know that this canal has no more chance of competition with that railroad than if you should put the slowest dray-horse that can be found in these streets against a thoroughbred trained to the race-course? Do we not know that just as soon as the railroad is constructed this whole work will be absolutely a loss? One portion of it has been abandoned already because a railroad has been constructed. Another railroad is now in process of construction; and the State of Ohio, finding that this is a dead loss upon their hands, that there is no money in it, now proposes to put upon the Treasury of the United States this adventure without profit.

Mr. President, it is a part of the scheme (I do not say it offensively) all through this bill to unload these works of internal improvement. This very engineer here quotes the precedent of Kentucky. We have just disposed of the Kentucky case, a case in which the estimate originally and the agreement between the Government and the State of Kentucky was an expenditure of $1,040,000. They have now expended $575,000 and estimate that $2,128,000 more will be required to be expended. This engineer says that these works are not in as ruinous a condition as those of the State of Kentucky, and he quotes the Kentucky precedent as an argument why this feature should now be retained in the bill.

So, with one abuse we beget another. This, if put into the bill, will be a precedent for another, which comes in two pages afterward; and from time to time, from one recurring session of Congress to another, the same argument is used: "If you improve the natural highways of the country, why not take upon your hands the canals and the slack-water navigation of the country which the States and which private corporations have undertaken to construct? It is perfectly useless, I know, to argue against it. I simply content myself with giving my reasons for acting as I have done as a member of the committee and in casting my vote against it in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say a very few words in reply to the Senator from Missouri. He asks the question whether any private corporation would take this work off the hands of the State. I tell him yes; I would do it. I would be glad to give half a million dollars for it if I could borrow the money; but I should want the right to levy tolls. If the tolls were levied, such tolls as would be considered reasonable by a corporation upon the property passing through this improvement—if a toll, say, of 10 cents a ton on the coal that passes down the river, or up, as some of it goes up, it would yield $33,000, which would be more than the interest on $500,000, and more than the cost of it; besides a toll could be levied on all the wheat, grain, and every variety of the production of that rich and populous valley. Besides, there are boats running along subject to toll, and in addition to that there is surplus water-power, which is rented, which yields a revenue of $5,000; and the Government of the United States would get the benefit of that.

But the Senator says we are tumbling and dumping these things on the United States. The difficulty was that the United States ought to have made this improvement in the first place. If the policy that now prevails had existed this demand never would have been made, because the Government of the United States would have made the improvement of the Muskingum one of the first improvements in the country. The very first river that excited the attention of the engineers after the commencement of the settlement of the northwest country was this Muskingum. When Chicago was an insignificant village, when there were no such States as Iowa and Minnesota and all those vast empires, the State of Ohio improved the Muskingum River. If we had been in our present condition, as a matter of course the United States would have improved this stream without cost to the people of Ohio. Then in that way we would have been put upon a footing of equality; but the policy of public improvement was only adopted afterward; and because the United States neglected to do it and the State of Ohio in self defense did it, therefore we are to be punished because we were too forward in doing what was the business of the United States.

My own opinion is, and I believe it is entertained by the leading lawyers of this body, that the State of Ohio had no power or right to put a dam or an obstruction of any kind or work of any kind on that navigable stream in the State of Ohio. I believe the tenor of the authorities is that a State has no power even to build a bridge or authorize the building of a bridge over a stream, much less to put a dam in it without the authority of the Congress of the United States. No such authority was asked, no such authority was supposed to be needed; but it shows that at that time they were laboring under a different state of affairs; and we now simply ask the Government to take free gratis for nothing, what we have done to promote this scheme of internal improvement.

But the Senator says if Congress should do this we shall be called upon to do more. Can the Senator from Missouri, fresh from his labors in the Committee on Commerce, tell me of any other improvement of the kind in the United States which has not been assumed by the Government? This is the only remaining one I know of. The Kentucky River was assumed by the Government of the United States; so were the Great Kanawha, the Little Kanawha, and all the other numerous streams which were improved. There is not a navigable stream in the United States that I can now recall, except the Monongahela, that was ever improved by a private company the control of which has not been assumed by the United States; and in the Monongahela case it is a valuable franchise, where tolls are levied and where it may be difficult even to purchase that property acquired under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania. So there is no danger of the Government being asked to assume the control of any more.

As a matter of course the engineer did say that it would cost $200,000, but the Senate well know that he said it would cost $200,000 for repairs that are necessary to put the works in perfect order from Dresden to Marietta, and that the chief expense would be in repairing the dam between Zanesville and Dresden. This only provides for the expense of the navigable stream between Zanesville and Marietta, 65½ miles, in a very populous portion of the State, Zanesville and Marietta being two of the most flourishing towns in the State.

It is asked why this anxiety about it; why does not Ohio levy tolls upon this property? The answer is that if Ohio should levy too heavy tolls on this property the people of the Muskingum Valley would be compelled to compete in the sale of their productions with a burden put on everything that they raise and send abroad, while all the people around about, just across the Ohio River, up at the head of the Ohio River, and on every stream below have the advantage of improved navigation, because every stream that is navigable which runs into the Ohio River is provided for in this bill except the Muskingum. The Wabash, the Illinois, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, the Monongahela, the Kanawha, the Allegheny, and every other stream are appropriated for. This is the last.

The engineer did say—and I think that is an argument in favor of this proposition—that the United States accepted the Kentucky River, and that is a reason why it should accept the Muskingum River. The Muskingum River, in my judgment, is a river of larger volume than the Big Kanawha, and probably would approach the magnitude of the Tennessee above the Mussel Shoals, and I think it is a larger stream than the Kentucky, according to my recollection, and I have seen them both. The Muskingum River I know all about, because I trudged along its banks when I was a lad as a junior rodman in the engineer corps. I know something about that. It is an important navigable stream. The engineer says:

As the locks and dams on the Muskingum are in much better condition than were those on the Kentucky River—

And remember the State of Ohio has maintained this improvement—

when a similar tender on the part of the State of Kentucky was accepted by the United States, and as the United States would probably expend much larger sums in building locks and dams on this river if no improvement had ever been made on it, I unhesitatingly recommend the acceptance of the offer made by the State of Ohio.

This is what General Merrill says. He says, too, if the United States had improved this river they would have made more expensive improvements than the State of Ohio made, of a higher grade; but even now, after fifty years of usage, it only requires $200,000 to put it in good condition, and the works cost originally $1,600,000. So they must be in very fair condition.

I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. As a matter of course we want only what others have received, and I believe that this proposition now to be voted upon is more unobjectionable and more defensible than any other in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of the facts stated in the report of the engineer. The Senator from Missouri has stated the case very fully.

Mr. VEST. Will the chairman of the committee permit me now—as I do not want to speak again—to state that I neglected to read all of the engineer's report on page 4. He has a financial statement there of the Muskingum River improvement. I did not state all the expense attending this transfer.

Mr. McMILLAN. As the Senator from Missouri calls attention to that statement I will read the additional paragraph to which he alludes:

It will be seen from the above—

That is, the financial statement of the Muskingum River improvement to which the Senator has referred—that during the last three years the expenditures on the Muskingum River improvement have averaged $31,007, while the receipts have averaged $16,113, or about one-half the expenditures. Were the United States to take charge of this improvement the annual revenue from tolls would disappear, and the only revenue that would remain would be that from rents, of which the annual average is about $4,000.

There are water-leases along this slack-water improvement which the State of Ohio grants to private parties and which yield the revenue referred to of $4,000. That is transferred, of course, by the State of Ohio to the Government if this improvement is accepted.

I wish to read for the information of the Senate the title and section 4 of the act of the Legislature of Ohio looking to the transfer of this improvement. The title is:

An act to grant the consent of the State of Ohio to the acquisition by the United States of certain lands within the State and bordering on the navigable rivers thereof, for the purpose of constructing canals or of erecting thereon dams, abutments, locks, lock-keepers' dwellings, offices, and all necessary structures for the construction and maintenance of slack-water navigation on said rivers, and ceding jurisdiction over the same, and for imposing fines and penalties for willful injuries to the grounds, buildings, and appurtenances acquired under the provisions of this act.

Passed May 2, 1885. Section 4 of the act is as follows:

SEC. 4. And for the purpose of enabling the United States to expend any sum of money that is or may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for the improvement of the Muskingum River, the State of Ohio hereby transfers and cedes to the United States the eleven locks and dams heretofore constructed by said State on said river, together with all the grounds, canals, and appurtenances belonging to the same, subject to the provisions of the preceding sections of this act, as to the jurisdiction of the United States over the lands and buildings authorized to be acquired and constructed by said sections, and imposing penalties for injuries to said work, [which] shall extend and apply to the said eleven locks and dams and their appurtenances hereby transferred and ceded to the United States; but the custody and ownership of said Muskingum River improvement shall remain in the State of Ohio until such time as the United States appropriates sufficient money to properly improve and operate the same.

That is the act proposing the transfer of all the property pertaining to the Muskingum River improvement. It embraces all the plans and improvements and properties connected with it, embracing these leases of water-power.

It is true that the engineer was directed in the examination of this subject to report his opinion upon the propriety of this transfer; and he says:

I am required by the river and harbor act to state "the improvements proper to be made." As applied to this particular case, I understand that I am expected to give my opinion as to whether or not the United States should accept the tender of the State of Ohio. As the locks and dams on the Muskingum are in much better condition than were those on the Kentucky River when a similar tender on the part of the State of Kentucky was accepted by the United States, and as the United States would probably expend much larger sums in building locks and dams on this river if no improvement had ever been made on it, I unhesitatingly recommend the acceptance of the offer made by the State of Ohio.

That is in view of his former statements that he deemed it proper to increase the estimate made by the subordinate engineer of the amount which will be required for the improvement of these locks and dams. He states the amount at $200,000. He says:

My own experience shows that nothing is more uncertain than estimates on hydraulic work, that hidden and unknown damages are constantly appearing whenever repairs are begun, and that the safest plan is to double all detailed estimates in order to provide for the unforseen. I therefore think it advisable to increase Mr. Gregory's estimate to $200,000.

That is the amount that will be required to be expended by Congress during the coming year in the improvement of these locks and dams. I suppose this stream is a very important one to the State of Ohio, that it is and has been navigable for a long time, and that the only question is whether or not the United States should assume the responsibility of this slack-water navigation and continue its improvement. I do not feel called upon, in view of the action of the Senate, to discuss the matter further, and will let them express their own views by their vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I have the liberty of voting on this question according to my judgment. On political questions I continue my pair with the Senator from Vermont, but on all other matters I reserve the right to vote. I vote "yea" on this proposition.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is detained in the room of the Committee on Appropriations on public business, and will be for the whole day. He is paired on all questions with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I will not renew the announcement during the day.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1031, after the words "lock and," to strike out "dam" and insert "approaches;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Saint Mary's River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, by a new lock and approaches, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 1039, to insert:

For the purchase of the two improved water ways known as the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, being the improved harbors of refuge and the water communication across Keweenaw Point, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior, by way of Portage River and lake, in the State of Michigan, and to make the same a free passage-way and harbors of refuge to commerce and navigation, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That before said moneys shall be expended the Secretary of War shall cause an examination to be made by a board of three engineers to ascertain and report upon the importance and value of the free use of said two harbors of refuge and the water communications across Keweenaw Point to the commerce and navigation of the lakes, and the reasonableness of the price therefor, and shall have received from said board a report favorable to such purchase by the United States, and also upon full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said two harbors of refuge, canals, easements, rights of way, piers, docks, and appurtenances of every nature belonging to and connected with said works, or either of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have some explanation of this amendment. I do not know that I am opposed to it, but I object to its being considered as agreed to without discussion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My attention was called to another matter by a Senator sitting near me at the time the amendment was read.

I desire to say that this amendment provides for the purchase of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-canal Railway and Iron Company Canal, which are two canals constituting one water way across Keweenaw Point, on Lake Superior, from one point of the lake to another, this peninsula extending out into Lake Superior a long distance, and these two canals constitute one water way across the base of this point.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], who is a member of the committee, is very familiar with the history of these improvements and with the effect of this water way upon the commerce of the lakes. He will explain to the Senate more fully the character of this improvement and the object of the appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, this channel or water way is a water way between two parts of Lake Superior across a point which on the map will be seen running up from the south shore of Lake Superior its whole length into the lake for about 120 miles. The navigation of Lake Superior, so far as the United States is concerned, is all along the southern shore. The straight line of navigation from White Fish Point, which is near the outlet of Lake Superior toward the Sault Sainte Marie, would nearly cross this point in the line of this water channel. The distance to be saved to navigation is around the very dangerous and rocky coast of Keweenaw Point; and I may say here that Keweenaw Point is the great locality of the copper region of Michigan. By passing through this channel, going about 25 or 30 miles through the channel, instead of going around the point, about 160 miles, perhaps 160 miles is saved; and it is around a point which has no natural harbor and no protection for vessels in case of storm.

It was very early seen, as the lake became navigable and business increased there, that vessels which ran to the main point on the southern shore of Lake Superior, Marquette, the center of the great iron region, in passing through there to Duluth on the lake would have to make a passage around Keweenaw Point, a distance of 150 or 200 miles, to get back upon the same line of travel that they could reach by crossing it.

The Government of the United States gave to the State of Michigan land to assist in making a harbor of refuge on the Lake Superior side of this channel. The State of Michigan chartered a company to make the Portage River Canal, which was the outlet of Portage Lake, lying in a hollow in this point, and they have improved the passage-way so that vessels traversing the lake pass through. They charge toll for this passage-way. The tolls for the last year amounted to $62,000. The average tolls for some years past have been from $43,000 to $62,000 a year; and that is levied upon all the vessels and tonnage of vessels, and a toll is levied upon the cargoes of all vessels that enter into this channel for the great copper mines, the Hecla mines, situated on Portage Lake, which is a part of this water way, and upon all the goods and provisions which are taken into that country.

The people of the States bordering on these lakes, by their Legislatures, have passed resolutions, some of them, for successive years, asking Congress to make this a free water way. I have here the resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, the Legislature of Michigan, the Legislature of Minnesota, and the Legislature of Wisconsin, two of which in successive years have repeated their resolutions, asking Congress to make this a free water way and thus relieve the shipping and merchandise of that region of this toll of from fifty to sixty thousand dollars per year in the last few years.

I have also in my hand the petitions of the boards of trade of cities in Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and Ohio, urging Congress in behalf of navigation and in the interest of commerce to make this a free channel and a free passage-way. I could read these resolutions, but they are all to the same effect, and many of them have been repeated from year to year, and I have brought these later ones to present to Congress at this time.

I will call attention to cities which have presented resolutions, and the remote places which are interested in this navigation. There were resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Chicago favoring the purchase of the canals connecting Portage Lake in Michigan with Lake Superior; resolutions of the Detroit Board of Trade in favor of the same; resolutions of the Duluth Board of Trade in favor of making a free canal; memorial of the Board of Trade of Erie, Pa., in favor of the acquisition by the United States of the Lake Superior and Portage Lake Canal; resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, Minn., to the same effect; a petition of the Saint Paul Chamber of Commerce praying for such legislation as will result in acquiring title to and ownership of the Lake Superior Ship-canal and a release of tolls; resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., to the same effect; resolutions of the Importers' Exchange of Toledo to the same effect.

There are other resolutions of other cities and other boards of trade to this effect, and they have been repeated in many instances from year to year, urging the purchase of this canal.

Besides this, I have the petition of more than a thousand ship-owners and navigators on the lakes, presented to Congress and referred to the Committee on Commerce, some of whom are residents of nearly every State in the Union. I have petitions of residents of Massachusetts, of residents of New York, interested in the commerce of that country; the petition of manufacturing companies; the petition of iron men; petitions from Oswego; petitions from different places, a hundred of them and more, and these are only a portion of the vast number of papers which have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, not only for this present use, but urging it in years gone by. There are several thousand people engaged in the commerce and navigation, directly and indirectly, of the Lake Superior region asking that this may be made a free canal.

A year and a half ago I untroduced into the Senate a resolution calling on the Secretary of War to report to Congress the necessity and the advisability of making this a free canal and relieving the commerce of the lakes of these tolls. The report of General Poe, the engineer in charge of the department of the lakes, perfectly familiar for years with the navigable history and commerce of the lakes, the gentleman in charge of all the public works on Lakes Huron and Superior, including the two canals and the great locks that have been made there, made an exhaustive report which is published on page 262 of the report of the committee, which may be found on the desks of Senators.

In that report, after enumerating the situation and condition of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-canal, he sums up his recommendation thus:

If the above estimate of the minimum cost of the property of the Lake Superior Ship-canal, Railway, and Iron Company ($3,000,000) and that of the Portage Lake and River Improvement Company ($300,000) is warranted by the facts disclosed, then the price asked for the two ($350,000) may be stated as only one-tenth the original cost. And if, by the payment of that sum by the United States to the companies in question, the ownership of this important water way, clear of all incumbrances, can be vested in the Government, thus rendering its navigation free to commerce, then there can be no question but that the price is reasonable and the purchase advisable.

I take it for granted that the members of the Senate generally have read this report and that many are familiar with the geography of that region. The reports of last year and this year show that the number of vessels traversing that region has doubled in every year for the last five or six years. The reports show, and the fact is, that the great lock built in the Sault de St. Marie, as has been stated on this floor, is to-day unable to put through the vessels that traffic on Lake Superior without causing delay and demurrage in their passage up and down; and a note from General Poe shows that they have increased so largely that an unusual number for this year was passing the lock and crowding it; and Congress, seeing the necessity of it, has made appropriations in the last bill and in this bill to build a new lock in addition to the magnificent one already there.

All of the traffic going through that canal, with the exception of Canadian traffic, would pass and does pass through this open channel now owned by a private company, except vessels loaded entirely at Duluth, which, in fair weather, pass around this point into the open lake. Some few vessels that pass up, probably one-twentieth, or perhaps only one-twenty-fifth of all the vessels that pass up and down the lake, pass around this rocky point, and the others pass through this canal and pay these tolls. They use it for safety, for economy of time, and in order to touch at the other important points lying on the route.

There is shipped out of this Portage Lake of native copper, mined on the banks of this interior lake of which these two canals form the outlet, annually over $6,000,000 worth of copper for the last few years. The toll on copper, I think, is a half cent a pound by the terms of the charter, and it is the only way in which those immense copper mines on Keweenaw Point, which furnish nearly half the copper of the world, have any water communication out into Lake Superior. The reports show that over $6,000,000 worth of copper is shipped from these mines annually, and the amount is increasing from time to time by the addition of other newly discovered mines. All the coal, all the materials, all the machinery, all the merchandise for the two important towns of Holton and Hancock, situated on this interior lake, all the goods taken in and all the products taken out, of which I have only mentioned the copper, pay this toll by the terms of the charter of the company which deepened the Portage River from 5 feet to 13½ and 14 feet, and which tolls are necessary to be paid; else there could have been no water communication over 5 feet in depth out into the deep waters of the lake.

I will not dwell upon this, because there was no question in the minds of those who were acquainted with it, and in the views of the people of the State, and in the views of the men engaged in commerce upon the lakes and men interested in the commerce of those lakes from one end of the country to the other, that the amount of tolls charged, and which will be increasing with the increase of business, ought to make this almost a natural channel with the addition of the works which have been put upon it, and ought to make this a free passage-way.

Besides that, from the Apostle Islands clear around this stormy point to Marquette, a distance of 270 miles, except this harbor of refuge into this lake through these canals on either side, there is not a safe harbor into which a vessel can run for all that 270 miles; and the Government originally aided this to make an opening into Portage Lake and make one of these canals a harbor of refuge, and it is so stated in the bill. The opening into Keweenaw Bay, a large bay, a great arm of the lake indeed, is also a harbor of refuge; and that is the only place where a vessel can run for shelter between the Apostle Islands, in Wisconsin, and Marquette and the iron region east of this place.

I will not prolong my remarks, for I think the report of the committee and the report of the engineer will satisfy every one that this channel should be free. It was originally an open channel of the lake, extending for several miles, forming part of it in the middle of this point, being from 60 to 70 feet deep. It was evidently once a channel through between the two parts of the lake; but it has been filled up on the one side by the washing of the gravel and the sand, making a canal very necessary, and by the shoaling of the river to about 5 feet on the other side, making necessary the great excavation which has been made there, and making the piers running out into the lake on either side for the entrance into this channel a necessity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1073, after the word "Congress," to insert:

And the sum of $8,000 of the above appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended above Portage City to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River, so as to prevent injury to the Government works on Fox River; and this expenditure may be made separately or, if deemed more economical by the Secretary of War, in adding to any protecting works which may be made by the State of Wisconsin.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Fox River, Wisconsin: Continuing improvement below Montello, on the approved plan, $75,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the examination and survey of the Wisconsin River from Portage to the mouth, now being made by a board of engineers, completed as soon as practicable, and a report thereof made on or before the meeting of the next session of Congress. And the sum of $8,000 of the above appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended above Portage City to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River, so as to prevent injury to the Government works on Fox River; and this expenditure may be made separately or, if deemed more economical by the Secretary of War, in adding to any protecting works which may be made by the State of Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before passing from this amendment, in line 1075 the word "above" before "Portage City" should be changed to "at or near."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made, if there be no objection.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1089, after the word "dollars," to strike out "of which $12,000 to be expended on the river at Grayville, Ill.;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois: Continuing work on lock and dams at Grand Rapids, and on the river from Grand Rapids to its mouth, $80,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment of the committee will not be agreed to. It is not a question of how much shall be appropriated, but simply a question of where the money shall be expended. The report of the Secretary of War states as follows:

The river near Grayville is in a condition which requires immediate attention. Here a serious "cut-off" is threatened, which will shorten the river about 3 miles, and by this sudden change of slope cause serious injury to navigation. The cut-off would also cause Grayville a great loss, as its principal business is sawing lumber, which would be entirely destroyed, as the cut-off would leave the town about 1½ miles from the channel of the new river. Steps should be taken to prevent this cut-off, and it is estimated that a sum of $20,000 could be judiciously expended for this purpose.

All that I desire is that the amendment shall not be agreed to, so that the same amount shall remain appropriated, but that the Secretary of War shall be required to spend a portion of it at that place and save the river. I hope the committee will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I think in regard to that the committee felt disposed to leave to the engineers in charge, after they had made their recommendation and had stated what part of the appropriation ought to be used, discretion to use the appropriation as they judged was for the best interests of the work. The engineer reports strongly in favor of having an immediate appropriation for this improvement; but that was in reference to a special provision.

Now, if the bill passes, and the engineer thinks it important, as he does unquestionably, to put the work at Grayville in order, and prevent what he thinks would be a serious injury to the river, of course it will be his duty and he will have the power to expend this money under the direction of the Secretary of War, wherever in the whole work it is most necessary, but the committee found inconvenience heretofore where a full appropriation was made for a full work in taking from the engineer the charge of it. I suppose the committee care very little either way, whether this amendment is adopted or not. I certainly myself have no objection to its being stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope it will be. Here is a sum of $80,000 proposed to be expended upon the Wabash River. This point at Grayville very specially needs immediate attention. It is not proposed to increase the amount of the appropriation in the aggregate. While in all probability the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers would spend this amount, or whatever amount is necessary, in protecting this point, yet it is too important to leave the thing even discretionary with the Chief of Engineers or anybody else, and I hope that the amount of $12,000 will be specifically appropriated for this particular purpose, as it is only a portion of what is necessary to complete the work, but that amount is necessary to protect the property of the Government at that point.

Mr. HARRISON. It looks to me as if this was not the fair thing toward Indiana. The Wabash River is the boundary line between Illinois and Indiana at this point. The total amount estimated for it was $180,000 or $190,000. The committee have given here:

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois: Continuing work on lock and dams at Grand Rapids, and on the river from Grand Rapids to its mouth—

Which covers the region where Grayville is situated, a lump sum. Of course that leaves it entirely in the discretion of the engineers as to where they will spend that money which is given generally for the improvement of the Wabash River. They can place it, as the Senator from New York suggests, where it is most needed. But my friend from Illinois wants to separate from the appropriation (which is entirely below an adequate amount as estimated for) $12,000 to be applied with special reference to the needs of Grayville, Ill., subtracting so much from the aggregate appropriation, and controlling the discretion of the engineer as to the expenditure of that amount. I think that ought not to be.

Here is an appropriation in which two States are interested. It is specified here—

Improving Wabash River, Indiana and Illinois.

And it is not fair, it seems to me, for either of those States to ask to give a special direction to these particular appropriations. They should be spent as the engineers, who have the responsibility of the work, think they can best expend the total amount appropriated for the river. It simply withdraws and cripples by so much, perhaps, improvements at other points that may be of interest to Vincennes and other points upon the river, and confines the expenditure to the benefit of a particular Illinois town. I think the Senator from Illinois ought to allow the appropriation to go generally for the benefit of the river. If the engineers regard this Grayville improvement as the most urgent, as the most important, then they will spend $12,000 of this total amount there, or more if they choose.

If they do not, they will expend it elsewhere. This specific direction ought not to be given, and this sum abstracted from the total amount appropriated for the river.

Mr. CULLOM. Ordinarily I should feel that it was entirely proper to allow the engineers to settle the question of the disposition of this money where they saw proper, and so far as the present engineer is concerned the probability is that he will expend the amount that is asked for at this particular place; but here is a locality which needs immediate attention, and which needs more money even than we have asked to expend of this total amount of $80,000, and it is because of the peculiar and particular distress that exists there to-day. While this engineer may be all right and understand the situation thoroughly, nobody knows what the next one may conclude in reference to it. I have no desire myself to interfere with the disposition of the balance of the money. The State of Indiana I believe gets all the balance of the appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. How?

Mr. CULLOM. What other place is there?

Mr. HARRISON. It goes on the river.

Mr. CULLOM. None of it goes to Illinois, I understand, except this amount which we are seeking to have appropriated, and here is a place that needs immediate attention. All I ask is that the little sum of $12,000 of the total appropriation be specifically stated as applicable to that purpose, so as to protect the river and the property there from immediate destruction, and to prevent injury to the people of that locality. I hope that the amendment will be disagreed to.

let it remain as our committee have left it if he could be sure that the present engineer would remain in charge, because he has already ascertained what his judgment is as to the relative merits of the various works to be done on the river; but he is not willing to leave it to the unbiased judgment of a competent officer who may succeed the one now in charge as to where this money ought to be expended. I submit that it ought to be so left.

The Senator says that Indiana gets all the balance of this appropriation. Not at all, Mr. President. The river, as I have said, is the dividing line up to the uttermost point named here, and the two States get equally the benefit of it. All I ask is that this money may be applied, according to the judgment of the engineer who at the time is in charge of the work, at those places on the river where the expenditure is most needed. I do not think it ought to be controlled in this way.

Mr. CULLOM. In view of this report, I appeal again to the Senator from Indiana. Here is an engineer who says:

Steps should be taken to prevent this cut off, and it is estimated that a sum of $20,000 could be judiciously expended.

And he goes on to recite the particular reasons why an amount of money should be expended there and expended without delay, and while I am simply asking that this small sum shall be specifically set aside for this purpose, I think neither the Senator from Indiana nor the committee ought to object to the amendment of the committee being disagreed to.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me this amendment ought to be agreed to in order to protect just what the Senator from Illinois wants to protect, which is the river at Grayville. If he has read the statement of the engineer correctly, he requires $20,000 to do that work, and the Senator proposes to limit him to $12,000. That is not sufficient to do it. It would be a waste of money to expend the $12,000 unless you are at liberty to spend $8,000 more to complete it. If the Senator leaves it where the committee have placed it, if the engineers are competent, as we are bound to assume they are, if they are honest, as we are bound to assume they are, instead of expending $12,000 at Grayville they will expend $20,000 of this money at Grayville and do the work complete. It seems to me the Senator from Illinois is perfectly safe to trust the Army engineers with this money. For his own protection I submit the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CULLOM. I can take care of my own protection without the help of the Senator from New York. If the Senate will give the $12,000, I will take care of the rest so far as the question of amount is concerned. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], but the pair does not apply to questions on this bill, and I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Berry,	Conger,	Harrison,	Spooner,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. There is an amendment of the committee not on the printed copy, adopted after the bill was printed. In line 1039, on page 43—I do not know whether the Chief Clerk has it in his copy or not—after the words "Bay City," to insert:

And $5,000 in improving the west channel along West Bay City.

That is part of the appropriation for improving Saginaw River, Michigan, defining where $5,000 shall be spent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 43, in line 1039 of section 1, after the words "Bay City," it is proposed to insert:

And $5,000 in improving the west channel along West Bay City.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is inserted merely as a correction of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that increase the appropriation?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; it does not increase the amount of the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know whether amendments to the bill are in order now or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are not.

Mr. VOORHEES. I submit an amendment:

For improving the Wabash River between Vincennes and Terre Haute, in Indiana, $25,000.

Simply remarking that I offered a similar amendment some time ago, and the committee seem to have taken no notice of it. I merely submit it.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment I offered was not an individual one. I stated that it was one adopted by the committee, but was not inserted in the printed bill. It was not an amendment I offered myself.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to my colleague, as his amendment has been offered before and was perhaps printed——

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Then it is hardly necessary to offer it again.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am afraid the committee lost it. They seem to have lost everything that relates to Indiana.

Mr. FRYE. It is not now in order under the agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

Mr. KENNA. I present an amendment to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received and printed; and so the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be printed.

Mr. KENNA. I desire the amendment offered by me to come in at the end of the first section.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 1095, after the word "improvement," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "forty;" and in the same line, after the word "which," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

Improving Calumet River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $40,000; of which $15,000 are to be used in dredging the river between the Forks and a point half a mile east of Hammond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, in the first proviso to the clause making appropriations for "improving Calumet River, Illinois," in line 1099, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That no part of said sum, nor any sum heretofore appropriated, except the said $15,000 for the river above the Forks, shall be expended until the entire right of way, as set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 9, second session, Forty-seventh Congress, shall have been conveyed to the United States free of expense, and the United States shall be fully released from all liability for damages to adjacent property-owners, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War; and if any of the owners of real estate required to be taken or that is damaged for the purpose of straightening or widening that portion of the Calumet River for which the appropriation herein is now made can not be induced to convey to the United States such real estate so required, and release their claim for damages caused by said improvement, or should the owner or owners be incapable of conveying and releasing, or should his or her name or residence be unknown, or he or she be a non-resident of the State of Illinois, it shall then be the duty of the United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois to immediately file a petition in any court having jurisdiction thereof, in the manner and as authorized by the laws of the State of Illinois in such cases, for the purpose of ascertaining the just compensation to be paid to the respective owners of the land taken or damaged.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, in the second proviso to the clause making appropriations "for improving Calumet River, Illinois," in line 1123, after the word "first," to strike out "contribute" and insert "execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the payment of;" after the word "such," at the end of line 1125, to strike out "proceeding, and shall furnish the amount necessary," and insert "proceedings and;" after the word "rendered," at the end of line 1127, to insert "therein;" and in line 1128, before the word "shall," to strike out "cause" and insert "proceedings;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That the other owners of property and parties interested in said improvement shall first execute a bond to the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the payment of the costs of such proceedings, and to pay any judgment that may be rendered therein; and on failure to do so the proceedings shall be dismissed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe it is not in order to offer an amendment to any portion of the bill at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, unless it is an amendment to an amendment of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I shall reserve it.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, after line 1133, to insert the following:

The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at the mouth of Rock River, or between it and the city of Rock Island, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $300,000. Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and feeders, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use: Provided further, That said canal shall be 80 feet wide at the water line and 7 feet deep, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and branch as specified in said survey.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I perhaps ought to apologize to the Senate for desiring to take any considerable time upon this amendment; but I think the importance of the subject justifies me in submitting some remarks in explanation of the necessity and importance of adopting the amendment; and I shall therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to enable me to do so.

Mr. President, the construction of the Hennepin Canal and the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, thereby forming a free water way from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan by the most practicable connection, is in my judgment the most important work of internal improvement now pressing upon Congress for consideration. No other public work which the Government is asked to undertake promises greater material benefits to the country in proportion to the expenditure required. I may be charged with exhibiting more zeal on behalf of this project than of some others because the entire length of the proposed canal would be within the borders of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. While I may have given more attention to the subject on that account, the fact that the canal would be wholly within the State of Illinois is not my reason for favoring with great earnestness its construction by the General Government. The demand for this improvement, as I shall hope to show, does not come from Illinois alone, nor would the canal benefit that State alone, or any more than it would other Western and Northwestern States. Illinois does not need this water way as much as does the great region lying west of the Mississippi River. The line of the canal runs through the northwestern corner of the State, and of the 55,414 square miles included within the borders of Illinois not more than one-fifteenth part would be directly tributary to the canal if built, because the products of most of the State would have to be carried as far to reach the canal as they would to reach Chicago. Illinois does not come here as a suppliant asking the bounty of the Government for its own advantage. Illinois, with more miles of railroad than any other State in the Union, with a free water way from its metropolis to the seaboard, with the Father of Waters washing the entire length of its western borders and affording connection with the Gulf, with the Ohio River on the South, and with direct connection with the great railroad systems of the East, South, and West, is not suffering from the lack of facilities for transportation, and will continue to maintain its commercial supremacy in the future as in the past, whether this work of improvement is undertaken by the Government or not.

No, Mr. President, I do not advocate this improvement simply because it would be of advantage to Illinois, but on broader grounds and for the general welfare. He who declines to look beyond the boundaries of his own State in the discharge of his own duties as a legislator here, fails to comprehend the full scope of the obligations resting upon him. I hope to show before I sit down that the proposed improvement is one of national importance, and would prove to be of great value to the commerce of the whole American people. If I do so, I hope that Senators will vote the proposed appropriation and let the work begin.

What is the exact thing that is asked?

First, the construction of a canal commencing at the Mississippi River at or near Rock Island and running to the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin.

Second, the acceptance by Congress of the grant already made by the State of Illinois of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the enlargement of the latter by the National Government to make its proportions correspond with those of the proposed Hennepin Canal.

The two propositions are intimately connected. They are indeed component parts of the one proposition that the Government shall undertake to connect the Mississippi River and its tributaries with the Great Lakes by canal, thereby opening up a great water route that would become available for the cheap transportation of the more bulky products of the West and Northwest to the Eastern markets and to the seaboard for export, and in the distribution of the merchandise and manufactured products of the East among the consumers of the West and Northwest. That such a project is of national importance will not, I think, be seriously questioned, and that the most feasible and economical method of carrying it into execution is by the construction of the Hennepin Canal and the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal must, I think, be conceded by those who will carefully and impartially investigate the subject.

THE IMPORTANCE OF CHEAP TRANSPORTATION AND THE VALUE OF WATER ROUTES.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that it needs any argument at this day to demonstrate the immeasurable importance of cheap transportation in promoting the commercial prosperity of a country. It is well understood that, as was truly said by Governor Horatio Seymour, "the chief element in the prosperity of every State or nation is the economy of transportation of persons and property."

Nor can the great value of water routes as a means of securing cheap transportation be questioned. The testimony collected by the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate abundantly demonstrates, it appears to me, the great importance of developing and maintaining a national system of internal water communication as the most certain and effective method of regulating railroad charges and of insuring to the people the advantages of cheap transportation. The concurrence of the views expressed upon these questions in the testimony taken by that committee is worthy of attention, and indicates a marked unanimity of public sentiment upon the subject. Without taxing the patience of the Senate with quotations from the testimony upon these points, I will simply invite attention to the following paragraphs, which show the conclusions of the committee as to the value of water routes and the effect of water competition upon railroad freight charges. I quote from the report:

The evidence before the committee accords with the experience of all nations in recognizing the water routes as the most effective cheapeners and regulators of railway charges. Their influence is not confined within the limits of the territory immediately accessible to water communication, but extends and controls railroad rates at such remote and interior points as have competing lines reaching means of transport by water. Competition between railroads sooner or later leads to combination or consolidation, but neither can prevail to secure unreasonable rates in the face of direct competition with free natural or artificial water routes.

The conclusion of the committee is therefore that natural or artificial channels of communication by water when favorably located, adequately improved, and properly maintained, afford the cheapest method of long-distance transportation now known, and that they must continue to exercise in the future, as they have invariably exercised in the past, an absolutely controlling and beneficially regulating influence upon the charges made upon any and all other means of transit.

And in concluding this branch of its investigation the committee say:

The cheapest mode of transportation known is by water. The railroads have accomplished wonders, but no railroad can successfully compete with a free and unobstructed water route, so far as the cost of carriage is concerned. Therefore, to secure the blessings of cheap transportation, and to hold our place among the nations of the earth, we must develop our natural water ways to their fullest capacity, and give the benefits of lake, river, and canal communication to the people of all the States as far as practicable.

The distribution of land and water throughout the United States is admirably adapted to the successful accomplishment of this purpose. The chief defects of the present water routes of the country, as a whole, are that they are too long for successful competition with the railroads, and that they are too isolated and disconnected for successful co-operation.

The obvious and only possible remedy for these defects is to shorten them and to unite them.

This can be done by means of such improvements as the construction of a ship-canal across the peninsula of Florida, the enlargement of the Erie Canal, the building of the Hennepin Canal, and the continued improvement of the Mississippi River. By thus shortening the existing lines of water communication and rendering them navigable for steam-vessels of large carrying capacity, the cost of freight service could be reduced to the lowest possible minimum, not only between a few great centers of trade, as now, but between interior points in almost every part of the country which are now practically without competing lines of transportation.

A comprehensive system of internal improvement such as has been here briefly outlined would develop to their utmost extent the inexhaustible resources of the United States, would give new life and healthy activity to trade throughout the length and breadth of the land, would put bread in the mouths of thousands of men now seeking employment without success, would avert the dangers to be apprehended from railroad combinations to control the commerce of the country, and would secure rates of transportation that would always enable the surplus products of the nation to find a profitable market.

During the present session we labored for weeks in this Senate in the interest of cheaper transportation to pass a bill to regulate interstate commerce, or, more specifically stated, to regulate the conduct of railroads engaged in interstate business. Why? Our purpose was to do what we could in that way to prevent extortion and unjust discrimination in railroad charges and to secure to the people reasonable and equitable rates for the transportation of freight by rail to the markets of the country. In this effort our progress was resisted at every step—on the one hand by those who do not believe in regulation by legislation, but prefer to leave the whole matter to be adjusted by the laws of trade and by the competition between the railroads; and on the other hand by extremists who are willing to engage in a general crusade against the railroads of the country, with little regard to the effect upon commerce and business.

Now, sir, when we come to this other means of securing cheaper transportation for the people we are met with the cry of unfairness to the railroads and of expense to the Government, and we are told that this project is simply the construction of a water way wholly within one State; that it is not the improvement of an existing water way; that the whole scheme is unconstitutional, and that Congress has no right to embark in the enterprise.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

Mr. President, the Constitution, thanks to the wisdom and foresight of our fathers who framed it, is broad enough in its provisions and scope to authorize works of national importance like this.

That great chart, by which statesmen are guided, or should be, in national legislation, and by which Presidents and Cabinets and courts and citizens should alike be controlled, has scope and breadth enough to allow the people for whose benefit it was formed to adopt such measures through their governing power as may from time to time become necessary in the interest of business and progress. It was for this purpose that the power to regulate commerce was expressly given to Congress, and it was for this purpose that the "general-welfare clause" and other provisions looking to the needs of the people as conditions change were inserted.

In the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 1) Chief-Justice Marshall forcibly said:

> The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the general concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State which do not affect other States and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government.

And in construing the power to regulate commerce he said:

> It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself; may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specific objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.
> The wisdom and discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints upon which they have relied to secure them from its abuse.

Judge Story, in his work on the Constitution, section 1067, says:

> The power to regulate commerce is general and unlimited in its terms. The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of power to regulate necessarily excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation on the same thing.

The settled doctrine of the United States Supreme Court upon the question is laid down in Mobile vs. Kimball (102 U. S., 691), in which case, referring to the power to regulate commerce, it is declared:

> That power is indeed without limitation. It authorizes Congress to prescribe the conditions upon which commerce in all its forms shall be conducted between our citizens and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of the several States, and to adopt measures to promote its growth and to insure its safety.

And in a late decision, rendered in April, 1885, in the case of Gloucester Ferry Company vs. Pennsylvania (114 U. S., 196), the same tribunal declared, speaking of commerce among the States:

> The power to regulate that commerce, as well as commerce with foreign nations, vested in Congress, is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed, that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free and when it shall be subject to duties or other exactions. The power also embraces within its control all the instrumentalities by which that commerce may be carried on, and the means by which it may be aided and encouraged.

The construction of a canal that would cheapen transportation throughout the country would certainly be the means of aiding and encouraging commerce among the States. Nor are numerous precedents lacking to justify Congress in undertaking the improvement now proposed. Canals to overcome natural obstacles to the navigation of important water ways have frequently been constructed by the General Government. In earlier days the method adopted was to grant public lands to the States for their use in the construction of canals, but in recent years Congress has not hesitated to make direct appropriations for the same purposes. Grants of land for canal purposes were made to Indiana and Illinois in 1827, to Ohio in 1828, to Florida in 1831, and to Michigan in 1852, while as early as 1826 Congress appropriated $150,000 to the Dismal Swamp Canal Company. These grants, like the millions of acres granted to aid in the construction of railroads, were all made for the purpose of improving the facilities for transportation and of promoting commerce, under the same power which Congress is asked to exercise for the same purpose in building the Hennepin Canal.

Within our own recollection, Congress has expended millions of dollars for the same purposes and in the exercise of the same power in the improvement of the Saint Clair Flats and in the construction of the canal around the Des Moines Rapids, of the Ohio Canal at Louisville and Portland, and of the Muscle Shoals Canal on the Tennessee River.

Lake Michigan and the Mississippi can be connected by means of the Hennepin Canal for about the same amount that was expended by the Government in overcoming the obstacles to the navigation of the Mississippi between Montrose and Keokuk. For commercial purposes as a water way the two parts of the Mississippi were as effectively separated by the Des Moines Rapids as if the State of Illinois had laid between them, as it does between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi, and the construction of the canal in the State of Iowa around the Des Moines Rapids connected what were virtually two separate water ways, although they were parts of the same river.

The Saint Clair Flats originally prevented free navigation between Lakes Huron and Erie. These flats were within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Michigan, and the question involved in their improvement was the same that is now presented in the proposed construction of the Hennepin Canal. Michigan was not more deeply interested in the removal of these obstructions to the navigation of the Great Lakes than were several other States, and there was no more reason why that State should incur the heavy expense necessary to their removal for the benefit of other States equally with itself than there is that Illinois should be asked to build this canal for the benefit of the West and Northwest.

The courts construe the Constitution liberally as they should do. While there is perhaps no decision exactly in point to prove beyond controversy that it is within the purview of the Constitution for Congress to construct such a canal as is proposed wholly within one State, I am unable to see any difference in principle between the construction of a canal to connect the two most important systems of internal water communication in the country, though it may happen to be located wholly within a single State, and the construction of canals within the States for the purpose of connecting the navigable portions of a great river or of affording free communication between two great lakes. The only question to be determined in either case, it seems to me, is whether the proposed improvement is of national importance and will promote the public welfare to an extent sufficient to justify the expenditure requisite being made from the funds belonging to the people of all the States.

The proposal on the part of the State of Illinois to make over to the Government its now completed Illinois and Michigan Canal is of comparatively recent date, and has not to any great extent heretofore engaged the attention of Congress. The Hennepin Canal project has been before Congress for some years, and while Congress has not gone further than to authorize surveys to be made, public sentiment has been growing in favor of the Government undertaking this great work. In order that the two propositions involved in the project may be better understood, I desire to review the history of the present Illinois and Michigan Canal now offered to the Government, and to call attention to the history of the movement in favor of the construction of the Hennepin Canal, and to some of the indorsements which this undertaking has received. In doing this I will be as brief as I can consistently with the importance of the subject.

THE ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

A survey was authorized by Congress in 1822 for a canal to connect Lake Michigan with the Illinois River, but nothing seems to have been done until 1827, when by act of Congress approved March 2 of that year a grant of public lands was made to the State of Illinois to aid in the construction of the canal. This act granted "a quantity of land equal to one-half of five sections in width on each side of said canal and reserving each alternate section to the United States, to be selected by the Commissioner of the Land Office under the direction of the President of the United States, from one end of said canal to the other." (Volume 4, Statutes at Large, 234.) This grant of land amounted to 290,915 acres, and is the only aid ever given by the Government to the State in the construction of the canal.

There does not appear to have been much discussion in Congress upon the act making this grant, probably because it followed along with the act to grant lands to the State of Indiana to aid in the construction of a canal to connect the Wabash River with Lake Erie. In the discussion of the latter measure it was argued that that canal would be of great benefit to the country generally, and the West particularly, in furnishing a water route for the transportation of the agricultural products of the West to Eastern markets. It was also argued that the lands it was proposed to grant had been obtained from the Indians at a cost of less than 1 cent an acre, and, while they were being disposed of to settlers at $1.25 per acre, the construction of the proposed canal would cause a ready market for the lands reserved at not less than $5 per acre. Hence the Government could well afford to grant one-half of a strip of land along the line of the canal, since its construction would enhance the value of the other half at least fourfold.

The Indiana grant was passed, and immediately afterward the grant to Illinois was passed, being the same in terms as the Indiana grant, though much smaller in the number of acres included.

Several surveys were made of the proposed Illinois and Michigan Canal, but none were adopted until 1836, when an estimate and detailed plan then made was determined upon. The State of Illinois carried on the work upon this plan until 1841, when work was suspended for want of funds. In 1845 the State effected an arrangement with her canal creditors whereby they advanced additional funds, and the work again went on. The canal was completed in 1848 at a cost to the State of about $6,500,000. This expenditure left the State very largely in debt, but that indebtedness was long since paid, partly from the proceeds of the sales of canal lands and partly from other revenues of the State.

The canal as thus constructed was 100 miles in length, 60 feet wide in earth, 48 feet wide in rock, and 6 feet deep. Since the construction of the canal the State of Illinois has expended nearly $1,000,000 in improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River by constructing dams and locks at Henry and Copperas Creek. This was made necessary in order to keep up navigation in the Illinois River, and thus make the canal useful in furnishing a water route from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River at the mouth of the Illinois River.

In addition to these expenditures the State of Illinois has reimbursed the city of Chicago for deepening the canal, which was done by that city at a cost of about $3,000,000. It will thus be seen that the present water route from the lake to the Mississippi River through the Illinois River represents a total outlay on the part of the State of about $10,000,000.

I have always believed that the improvement of this water way is a work of national importance, which should not devolve upon one State alone. In January, 1881, while governor of Illinois, if I may be permitted to quote what I then said upon the subject, in a message to the Legislature I said:

> The demand for the enlargement of the canal and the completion of the Illinois River improvement grows more urgent every year, and it is a matter which by no means interests Illinois alone, but is of equal importance to all the States which border on the Mississippi River, and to all those which depend upon the great valley for their food supplies. While this water way happens to be wholly within the territory of Illinois, its improvement is not a question of local or State interest.
> * * * The advantage to the nation resulting from connecting the lakes with the Mississippi River, the North and East with the West and South, by a water way through which can pass the bulky products of the Mississippi Valley will be infinitely more than the cost of such improvement.

Again, in 1882, when the Legislature was convened in special session, in calling its attention to this subject, I said:

> I regard this as a most important matter, and one in which the people of the whole country are interested. The time has come, in my judgment, when it is clearly the part of statesmanship to make this canal, now belonging to our State, a great water way, free to the commerce of the people of the nation and adequate to its requirements. It should be made wide and deep enough to contain a volume of water flowing constantly from the lakes to the Mississippi River of sufficient size to fully answer the demands of trade for years to come. In connection with this canal and the improvement of the Illinois River the proposed canal from Hennepin, on the Illinois River, to the Mississippi River, at or near Rock Island, should be constructed of such capacity as will meet the needs of the commerce of the great West. The work is national in character and importance, and should not be done by Illinois alone. While both canals and the river are entirely within the territorial limits of our Commonwealth, yet the benefits to be derived from their construction and improvement would be coextensive with the nation, North, South, East, and West.

In accordance with my recommendation the Legislature passed "an act ceding the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the United States," which act was approved April 28, 1882. Section 1 of that act provides—

> That the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its right of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State may now have in any real estate ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes, be, and are hereby, ceded to the United States, for the purpose of making and maintaining an enlarged canal and water way from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers; and this cession is made upon the condition that the United States shall, within five years from the time this act takes effect, accept this grant, and thereafter maintain the said canal and water way for the purpose aforesaid. In case the United States shall accept this grant, it is upon the express condition that the canal shall be enlarged in such manner as Congress shall determine, and be maintained as a national water way for commercial purposes, to be used by all persons, without discrimination, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe.

This act was submitted to a vote of the people of Illinois at the general election in November, 1882, and was ratified by a very large majority, and its ratification was announced by proclamation of the governor the same month.

In the following November the governor of Illinois forwarded to the President of the United States a certified copy of said law and of the proclamation of the governor announcing the ratification of the act by the voters of the State. The communication from the governor of Illinois, with its accompanying papers, was referred by the President to the Secretary of War, who returned it December 11, 1883, with a report thereon by the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, in which he submitted estimates of the cost of constructing the Hennepin Canal. In concluding his report the Chief of Engineers said:

> Inasmuch as Congress has made provision for a survey and estimate for enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and as the State of Illinois has taken steps toward transferring the canal to the United States, and as there appears to be no question as to the benefit which would result to commerce and navigation by the proposed enlargement in case the Hennepin Canal project is adopted, it is recommended that the subject be submitted to Congress, in accordance with the wishes of the governor of Illinois.

On the 9th of January, 1884, President Arthur transmitted all these papers to Congress, commending the subject to its consideration as one of great importance.

Notwithstanding the active competition encountered from numerous railway lines the canal has for years more than held its own in the amount of traffic transported, as is shown by the following official statement of the number of canal-boats running, of the clearances issued, of the miles run, and of the tons transported on the Illinois and Michigan Canal during the past twenty-six years, from 1860 to 1885, inclusive:

The State of Illinois offers to grant this canal to the United States, not because it desires to get rid of an unprofitable investment but because it stands ready to do its full share toward providing the connection between the Mississippi and the lakes, which the commerce of the country requires. This canal, including the improvement of the Illinois River, represents an expenditure on the part of the State of about $10,000,000, and the property included in the grant is worth many millions. It has never been the policy of the State to operate this canal as a source of revenue, and yet with the low tolls that have been imposed the receipts from the canal during the past thirty-eight years—1848 to 1885, inclusive—show a balance of $1,614,005 over the expenditures for ordinary and extraordinary repairs, renewals, and operating expenses.

Under the terms of the grant made by the State it must be accepted by the United States before November 22, 1887.

HISTORY OF THE HENNEPIN CANAL MOVEMENT.

The question of constructing some kind of a water way through which vessels of large tonnage might pass back and forth between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan is not a new one. For many years the subject has been agitated, and many plans have been suggested and discussed. River improvement conventions, State Legislatures, and boards of trade have from time to time urged the importance of such a connection between the country's two greatest systems of internal communication by water, and I do not believe that any public improvement ever received so strong an indorsement as this has.

As far back as 1845 a convention was held in Memphis, Tenn., consisting of five hundred and eighty-three delegates from the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, the two Carolinas, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and the then Territory of Iowa, the object of which was "to confer on measures which should be adopted for the development of the resources of the valley of the Mississippi and adjacent States on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast." That convention appointed a committee to memorialize Congress upon the subjects referred to in the resolutions adopted by the convention, among which was this one:

> That the project of connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes of the North by a ship-canal, and thus with the Atlantic Ocean, is a measure worthy of the enlightened consideration of Congress.

The memorialists of that convention, being representatives from South Carolina, Kentucky, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Missouri, urged upon Congress the importance of such an improvement from a military as well as commercial point of view. The memorial of that convention, when presented to Congress, was referred to a select committee of the Senate, of which Hon. John C. Calhoun was chairman. That committee made an exhaustive report thereon, and upon the subject of a ship-canal between the Mississippi River and the great lakes said:

> In reference to that portion of the memorial which relates to the connection of the Mississippi and the lakes by a canal which would admit ships of the largest class navigating either to pass from one to the other, your committee fully concur in all which it states in reference to its importance; but they are of the opinion that Congress has no power under the Constitution to construct such a work.

These facts are referred to as showing that even at that early day the importance of the connection it is now proposed to make between the great river and the great lakes was realized by citizens and statesmen. If it was important then, how much more important now! The vast regions of country in the West and Northwest, then a wilderness, have now become populous States and Territories, producing a large proportion of the food supply of the East as well as of foreign countries. The opinions then prevailing as to the limited power of Congress to make internal improvements have given place to later and more enlightened constructions of the Constitution. Vast sums of money are expended by the Government every year on the improvement of rivers and harbors and in digging canals in the interest of commerce which, under the views prevailing in the days of Calhoun, could not be appropriated without positive outrage to the Constitution.

I am satisfied that, had the views that have of late years prevailed among the wisest of our statesmen concerning the power of Congress to appropriate money for internal improvements prevailed more generally in an earlier day, we would not now be engaged in the consideration of this project, for this canal would long since have become an accomplished fact.

All the conventions held in recent years in the interest of Western water ways have indorsed this project, among which may be mentioned those held at Saint Louis in 1880, at Davenport in 1881, at New Orleans in 1885, and at Saint Paul last September. These conventions were composed of hundreds of delegates representing the States in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys, North and South.

The Northwestern water ways convention, held in Saint Paul last September, was attended by nearly a thousand delegates from Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota, and Montana. These delegates represented 744,808 square miles of territory, and not less than thirteen million people. The annual products of the region represented are valued at $3,000,000,000. At that convention the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the extension of the same by the construction of the canal from the Illinois River at Hennepin to the Mississippi River at Rock Island, thereby connecting the great lakes with the Upper Mississippi and giving a continuous line of water transportation from the Mississippi Valley to the Atlantic seaboard, is demanded in the interest of cheap transportation and the now immense and growing commerce of the Northwest, and we call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the construction of such canal and the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal by the General Government.

The Legislatures of New York, Iowa, and Illinois have memorialized Congress in behalf of this improvement. It has been indorsed several times by the National Board of Trade and by the commercial organizations of Chicago, Saint Paul, Minneapolis, Saint Louis, La Crosse, Duluth, Davenport, Muscatine, Rock Island, Buffalo, Syracuse, and New York city. It has been twice recommended by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, and the New York Produce Exchange made the first exception to its general rule on these questions by unanimously indorsing this canal, saying in substance:

That this was the first time since their organization that they had recommended the General Government to aid or construct internal improvements, or had asked or advised their Representatives in Congress to vote appropriations for any internal improvement of any kind; that this was an exception, and if they were not firmly convinced that it had merit they would not depart from their universal rule.

Among the many petitions and memorials presented to Congress from time to time in favor of this work, none I think are more significant than those which during this session have been coming in from different assemblies of the Knights of Labor all over the country praying Congress to construct the Hennepin Canal. Each of these assemblies represents a separate constituency of men who earn their bread by labor and who form an important part of the Government whose agents we are. These men ask and have a right to ask that Congress shall do whatever it can to lessen the price of the food they consume by reducing as much as possible the cost of its transportation, and they also urge the propriety of constructing this canal at this time when thousands of honest men are unable to obtain employment and are suffering for the necessaries of life.

In the light of the facts cited and the indorsements mentioned I disclaim for these projects any purely local character. The canal it is proposed to build, as well as the one already built and now offered to the United States are, it is true, entirely within the territorial limits of Illinois, but other States are much more directly to be benefited by the improvement than Illinois. The object of the proposed connection between the lakes and the Mississippi is to provide cheaper carriage for heavy freights passing between the East and the West. The freight seeking a water route from the West to the East or from the East to the West must pass through Chicago, and the much higher charges of transportation now prevailing between the West and Chicago than between Chicago and the East give rise to the necessity of and demand for this canal.

Congress has a number of times authorized surveys of routes for this canal to be made by Government engineers at Government expense. In authorizing these surveys Congress could have had no other thought than the possibility if not probability that it would sooner or later authorize the construction of the canal; and such action was certainly an expression of belief in the power of Congress under the Constitution to construct such a canal, and that the commerce of the country would, sooner or later, demand that it should be built. In the Forty-seventh Congress the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate reported an amendment to the river and harbor bill making an appropriation to commence the construction of the Illinois and Mississippi, or Hennepin Canal. This was not adopted by the Senate, but provision was made for a new survey, the results of which have been presented to Congress this session.

WHAT IS PROPOSED.

The river and harbor act of 1882 directed a survey to be made for a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near Hennepin by the most practicable route to the Mississippi River at or above Rock Island, to be not less that 70 feet wide at the water line and not less than 7 feet in depth of water, and with capacity for vessels at least 280 tons burden. The act also provided for a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and for estimates of the cost of enlarging it to the dimensions of the proposed Hennepin Canal. These surveys and estimates were made and transmitted by the President to the last Congress at its first session. (Senate Executive Document No. 38.) A supplemental survey has since been made and transmitted to Congress the present session. (House Executive Document No. 117.) Reference is made to these surveys and reports for detailed information as to the route, practicability, and cost of this improvement.

None of the engineers engaged in these surveys raise any question or express any doubts in their reports as to the practicability of constructing the proposed water way, and Maj. W. H. H. Benyuard, of the Engineer Corps, who had charge of the surveys, says:

The surveys demonstrate that a perfectly feasible route exists for a canal from the Illinois River, near Hennepin, to the Mississippi, at or above Rock Island.

The dimensions of the canal as agreed upon by the engineers and on the basis of which the estimates were made provide for a width of 80 feet at the surface and a depth of 7 feet of water, with locks 170 feet long and 30 feet wide, which would give a capacity sufficient at the most unfavorable stage of the main river for the passage of barges of 300 tons, although with deep water such barges could, with the box-top, carry 600 tons.

To make the dimensions of the Illinois and Michigan Canal correspond with the size of the proposed Hennepin Canal would require an enlargement of 20 feet in width, an increased depth of 1 foot, and the adding of 60 feet to the length and of 12 feet to width of the locks, no change in the number or location of the locks being necessary. The estimated cost of this enlargement is $2,298,919.15, which would increase the size of the canal about 25 per cent. The present canal offered to the United States is 96 miles long, and with the Illinois River has extended water communication from Lake Michigan two-thirds of the distance to the Mississippi.

The length of the proposed Hennepin Canal is 74.5 miles by one of the routes surveyed to Rock Island and 77 miles by the other. Six routes in all have been surveyed, which follow different lines at the western end, and the estimated cost of each is as follows:

Rock Island route, via Green River	$6,709,536
Rock Island route, via Penney's Slough and Rock River	6,554,052
Watertown route, via Green River	7,207,646
Watertown route, via Penney's Slough	6,306,552
Marais d'Osier route	5,811,367

The difference in cost between the most northern and the Rock Island route, via Penney's Slough, is $542,685, and between the northern route and the other Rock Island route is $698,169. The difference in cost between the Penney's Slough Watertown route and the two Rock Island routes is very slight. General Newton, the Chief of Engineers, in view of the commercial importance of the cities of Rock Island, Davenport, and Moline, all close together, favors a route having its terminus at Rock Island, and I am of the opinion that if the canal is built it should make that city its western terminus, as is proposed in the amendment reported by the committee.

WHY THIS IMPROVEMENT SHOULD BE MADE.

The States and Territories lying in the vast expanse of the Upper Mississippi and Missouri River Valleys produce more than one-third of the food supplies necessary for the general consumption of the nations and they are as well consumers of the products of other sections of the Union to the extent of the purchasing capacity of our own surplus products. The great markets are reached with more difficulty and at greater expense from this productive region than from any other portion of our country, and hence it is that the thirteen millions of people inhabiting this fertile domain bear a heavier burden in the shape of transportation charges than the remainder of our population because of the long distances and expensive routes over which their products and purchases are necessarily carried to and from the Eastern States and Europe. Whatever improvements can be made that will reduce the cost of carriage will tend to reduce the cost to consumers everywhere of one-third of our entire food supply. Even should the entire saving go only into the pockets of the producers of this great empire and add only to their wealth the General Government would be justified in making liberal expenditures for their benefit. But it must be plain that the millions thus saved would be expended in making purchases of the products of other sections which would reap like profits from the increased demand for their products and the reduced cost of their distribution. Therefore in either point of view it is clear that whatever saving can be effected in the transportation tax will prove materially advantageous to West and East alike, and will add to the wealth and prosperity of the entire Union.

We are all familiar with the marvelous development and unexcelled resources of this great productive area, which is capable of furnishing the food supplies of the continent. Its productive capacity seems almost unlimited, but in consequence of the recently increased and more successful foreign competition a point has been reached where it is a question whether this vast domain shall continue to prosper unless it can be relieved of some portion of the onerous burden now imposed upon it for transportation. The numerous lines of railway constructed through this Territory have failed to relieve this burden upon the staple products of the people to a sufficient extent to enable them to compete successfully with other countries and other sections of the United States, and they are therefore compelled to look to the development of the water ways with which nature has bountifully supplied them as the only available means of relief. They have 7,000 miles of rivers which are or can be made navigable and 1,000 miles of lake coast, and they ask that these natural highways be improved and connected, not only for their own relief but for the benefit of the whole people; not only to increase the returns from their own labor but their capacity to purchase the fruits of the labor of others; not only to reduce the cost of food in all parts of the Union, but to increase the earnings of the wage-worker and the profits of the manufacturers everywhere by increasing the demand for the products of every industry.

To show what can be done in this direction by improvement of the water ways I need only to call attention to what has been done toward reducing the cost of carriage by water between Chicago and New York. The improvement of the Saint Clair flats by the Government revolutionized grain transportation on the great lakes by making possible the use of steam-vessels capable of carrying cargoes three times as large as those carried before, and of towing at the same time barges carrying as much more. Before these improvements were made the movement of 25,000 bushels of grain by a single vessel was an unusual feat, but since that time a single steamboat with its barges has transported 260,000 bushels on one trip. There can be no doubt that the millions expended by Congress upon the Saint Clair flats, in connection with the abolition of tolls on the Erie Canal, have saved many millions annually to the people and for a time gave the United States control of the grain markets of the world. The immense saving effected by these improvements is indicated by the fact that a permanent reduction of 12 cents a bushel has been made in the cost of transporting grain from Chicago to the Atlantic seaboard. If the old rates should be restored we would not export any cereals at all; and unless the rates from the West and Northwest can be reduced by extending to that region the benefits of water carriage the production and exportation of cereals, which in 1880 comprised almost one-third of the entire exports of the United States, must continue to be limited.

We all know that the water rates between Chicago and New York effectively regulate and control all railroad rates between points to the east of the Mississippi River. This regulation is potential upon five-sixths of the line traversed by the immense traffic passing between the Atlantic coast and the region beyond the Upper Mississippi, but it ceases at Chicago, and it costs more for transportation over the one-sixth of the distance which lies beyond the reach of this regulative influence than it does over the remaining five-sixths. And the farther any of this territory is removed from a water route the more oppressive and burdensome do the charges for transportation become.

This is shown by a few examples cited in the memorial presented to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in which the following statements will be found:

> Water transit for freights is proved to be the cheapest possible. As an example, coal was carried at an average charge for the season of 1884, from Erie and Buffalo to Chicago, about 1,000 miles, for 64 cents per ton; thence to the Mississippi River, 200 miles, the charge was $2; for the next 100 miles it mounts up to $4 per ton from Chicago; and in Western Iowa and Minnesota it runs upward to a much higher figure.
> Take another example. The freight on a bushel of wheat between Northern Iowa and Chicago, some 400 miles, is and has been for the season of 1884, 10.8 to 16.8. From points in Nebraska and Southern Minnesota 16.8 to 21 cents; the highest figure being more than the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat in June, 1884, from Chicago to Liverpool, about 4,500 miles—showing at least 4,000 miles, for the same price, in favor of water transit. So oppressive have been the enormous freight charges for some time past, that wheat was sold west of the Missouri River for 30 cents per bushel, and corn for 12, making its value by the ton less than that of coal, so that producers have actually burned it for fuel. It is therefore plain that if Congress does not want the vast fertile West—the Upper Mississippi Valley—to go back to its primitive desolation they must provide cheaper water transit for its cereal and other products.
> The water lines from New York by canal and lake now end at Chicago. With the Hennepin Canal they would be extended to Saint Paul. Instead of the freight on a bushel of wheat between Minnesota and Northern Iowa and Chicago being from 16 to 21 cents per bushel, Major Benyaurd has shown that by river and canal it would be only 6 cents. This would reduce the cost of the bread on every table of the people of the seaboard States from 12 to 20 per cent. for every day in the year. It would also leave millions of money among the people of the Upper Mississippi States. Again, it is asked, is not the Hennepin Canal a most important national work?

This is the situation; and the purpose in constructing the Hennepin Canal is to extend the beneficial influence of the most effective regulation known over a vast expanse of the most productive territory of the United States by connecting the great lakes and the Mississippi by the cheapest and most practicable method that has been suggested. This canal could be and would be used by an immense traffic, but its regulative influence would affect an immensely greater traffic than could or would seek its line. It is estimated that between Saint Paul and Saint Louis 12,000,000 tons of freight annually cross the Mississippi, all of which would be affected by providing water communication between the river and the lakes, and a small saving in the freight charges on these shipments would equal every year the entire cost of this proposed improvement.

The vast empire lying within the Upper Mississippi and Missouri River Valleys, comprising the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Dakota and Montana, contains one-fourth of the area of the United States, not including Alaska, and has a population of at least 13,000,000, or nearly one-fourth that of the United States. The wonderful productive capacity of this territory is indicated by the following statement, compiled by Col. P. B. Walker, of the Minnesota River Commission, showing the extent of its productions last year, in spite of the heavy charges for transportation with which it is burdened and the low prices prevailing:

The natural outlet for a large proportion of these products is through the great lakes to the East, the trend and tendency of this commerce being eastward. The traffic now carried on upon the Upper Mississippi River and its tributaries is much more extensive than is commonly supposed, as persistent efforts are made presumably in the railroad interest to create the impression that the river has virtually gone out of use. Between the mouth of the Chippewa and Saint Louis there are eighty mills on the main river, with an annual day-sawing capacity of 800,000,000 feet of lumber, employing some sixteen thousand men, and representing about $20,000,000 of capital. On the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries, the Saint Croix, Chippewa, Wisconsin, and Black, there are about two hundred mills engaged in the manufacture of lumber, the greater part of their product being floated into the Mississippi.

The statement of the traffic that has passed through the Des Moines Rapids Canal since it was opened in 1877 to June 30, 1884, shows that it included 6,059 steamboats and 3,323 barges, 59,079 passengers, 368,572 tons of merchandise, 8,263,189 bushels of grain, 219,697,812 feet of lumber, 47,175,134 feet of logs, 82,838,561 lath, and 95,604,150 shingles.

In 1883 the number of steamboats, barges, and rafts passing the bridges over the Mississippi at the points named was as follows:

Bridge at—	Steamboats.	Barges.	Rafts.
Winona	4,893	828	1,352
La Crosse	4,316	509	1,663
Dubuque	3,585	867	1,422

Rock Island	2,561	142	972
Burlington	1,943	291	379
Keokuk	1,856	400	287

In the steamboat districts extending from Saint Louis to Sioux City on the Missouri and to Saint Paul on the Mississippi there are employed more than 300 steamboats, with an aggregate tonnage of 65,000, as against 122 in 1860, and the reports show that more than three and a quarter million passengers were carried on those steamboats last year, notwithstanding the popular belief that, so far as passenger travel is concerned, the great river has gone into what the Executive would call a state of "innocuous desuetude."

These figures, though incomplete, suggest almost unlimited possibilities in the way of cheap water carriage throughout the Northwest when its natural highways have been properly improved and their free navigation secured. Let us now glance at the commerce of the great lakes which the Hennepin Canal would connect with this traffic on the Mississippi and its tributaries. In 1885 nearly 31,000,000 tons of freight passed through the Sault Sainte Marie Canal during the short season of navigation. Although the number of miles of railway leading into Chicago from the West is 23,401 by main lines and 47,931 including branches, the trade of that city is by no means confined to shipments by rail. The reports of the Treasury Department show that during the year ending June 30, 1885, the number of vessels, foreign and coastwise, that arrived and cleared from the principal ports of the United States and from Chicago was as follows:

	Arrived.	Cleared.	Total.
New York	7,789	8,470	16,259
Boston	3,190	3,230	6,420
Baltimore	2,241	2,480	4,720
Philadelphia	1,991	2,295	4,286
San Francisco	1,035	1,268	2,303
New Orleans	1,034	998	2,032
Portland and Falmouth	704	711	1,415
Total	17,984	19,452	37,436
Chicago	10,437	10,546	20,983

From this statement it will be seen that the total number of arrivals and clearances at Chicago during the year lacked but 6,453 of being equal to the combined arrivals and clearances at all the other leading parts above named, and lacked but 1,696 of being equal to the total number at New York and Boston, the two ports next highest on the list in this respect. It also appears that the total arrivals and clearances at Chicago were larger in number than those at Baltimore, Boston, New Orleans, Philadelphia, and San Francisco combined, which aggregated 19,762; that they were equal to the combined arrivals and clearances from New York and Baltimore, numbering 20,980; that they exceeded those from New York and Philadelphia, which numbered 20,545; that they exceeded those from New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco combined, which aggregated 20,594; and that they were larger than the total number at New York, Portland, Falmouth, and San Francisco combined, which was 19,977.

Do not these suggestive statistics demonstrate the expediency and importance of connecting the great lakes with the Mississippi by a free water way, thus uniting the vast commerce of the lakes with that of the great river and extending the benefits of each to an immensely enlarged area at a comparatively small cost?

In considering the propriety of making the expenditures required to perfect the system of water ways with which nature has endowed the Northwest Congress may properly take account of the fact that the entire expenditure necessary for this purpose would be far less than the value of the 35,546,207 acres of land which have been donated to railways within these nine States and Territories, and that the Upper Mississippi States contributed to the national Treasury in 1885 on account of internal revenue the sum of $34,228,292.72, as appears from the following statement of the amount of internal-revenue taxes collected from States whose cereal products would be afforded cheap transportation by the construction of this canal:

Illinois	$23,075,864 61
Iowa	2,222,059 15
Kansas	170,202 02
Nebraska	1,971,296 12
Minnesota	492,704 97
Missouri	6,276,165 85
Total	34,228,292 72

This statement shows that a small percentage of the amount annually contributed to the national Treasury by these States would defray the cost of the proposed improvement.

In seeking the cause of the recent depressed condition of our agricultural and manufacturing interests, the decrease in our cereal exports within recent years is a fact which prominently claims attention. In 1880 our cereal exports amounted to 284,000,000 bushels, reducing flour to bushels, and including corn and corn-meal, their estimated value being $288,000,000, and constituted nearly one-third of the entire exports of the United States. In 1883 the amount was reduced to 176,000,000 bushels, and in 1884 to 151,000,000 bushels of an estimated value of $162,000,000, showing a reduction of $126,000,000 in the value of our cereal exports within four years.

To account for this decrease it is only necessary to observe what is being done by other nations which are competing with ours in supplying the markets of the world with bread. The vast expenditures being made by the leading European nations for public improvements designed to secure cheaper transportation are concisely stated in a document published last March by Hon. Horatio Seymour, jr., of New York, who says:

> Experience has taught the nations of Europe the value of cheap transportation, and they have made every effort to improve their water ways.
> Austria, Germany, Holland, France, and Italy have 18,446 miles of inland navigation. Austria is building a canal between the Danube and the Elbe, 138 miles long at an expense of $29,000,000, and is improving the Danube.
> Germany is expending $86,000,000 on her water routes and has commenced a canal, with the help of Russia, from the Baltic to the North Sea that will cost $50,000,000. Holland has just completed a ship-canal from Amsterdam to the sea, and France is engaged on four great water routes, for which she has appropriated $200,000,000, which will cost much more than that to finish. Russia has a system of canals connecting the Baltic and the Black Seas, the Volga and the Caspian Seas, and the Baltic and the White Seas. She has just completed a canal 22 feet deep from St. Petersburg to Cronstadt, at a cost of $9,000,000.
> England has 2,360 miles of canal, and is making preparations to build a canal from Manchester to Liverpool 26 feet deep, which will cost $40,000,000; also one from London to Bristol and another from London to Liverpool. Two ship-canals are proposed in Ireland. England has spent large sums in cutting canals for irrigation and transportation combined in India. She proposes to cut through the Siam Peninsula, a distance of 66 miles, at a cost of $20,000,000. Greece has nearly completed a ship-canal at a cost of $5,500,000.
> In our country, Canada, whose canal system cost $42,000,000, is spending $1,000,000 to deepen the Welland Canal to 14 feet. Three other canal schemes are proposed by the officials at Ottawa, the most important of which is from Montreal to Lake Huron, by way of the Ottawa and French Rivers.
> * * * This has been called the "canal age," because of the magnitude and extent of the canal operations all over the world. This revival of the water routes has been brought about by the growing opinion expressed by an eminent engineer that "in any country it is highly important, alike for agricultural and other industries, that there should be a network of canals running somewhat parallel to that of the railroads."
> The United States has not kept pace with Europe; there are but 2,500 miles of canal in this country, which is a small amount when we consider the extent of our territory.

It was also stated by Hon. John C. Dore, of Chicago, before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors in January last, that the mileage of the French canals and rivers completed was 7,069, and of those projected and to be completed 1,813, making a total of 8,882 miles; that the total cost of those completed was $218,000,000, and the estimated cost of those to be completed is $200,000,000 more. And in quoting from the "administration report of the railways in India for 1884'-85," Mr. Dore called attention to the fact that the expenditure for canals alone in India up to the end of the fiscal year 1882-'83 had been $103,800,000; "as much within about $2,000,000 have they spent there on canals for transport and irrigation as this entire country has expended on all its internal improvements from the foundation of the Government until now." He also showed from the official reports that the government from 1859 to 1883 had expended $156,800,000 in that country in subsidizing railroads in the interest of cheap transportation, and that the loss to the government on these railroad investments during these twenty-four years had been $124,750,000.

The enterprise and liberality of these nations in making public improvements in the interest of cheaper transportation is in striking contrast with the policy pursued by this Government, especially when we consider the heavy burdens of taxation under which those nations labor on account of standing armies, navies, public debts, &c. Think of France maintaining her army and navy at an annual expense greater than the entire amount this Government has expended on account of public improvements since its foundation!

There are no other expenditures, Mr. President, that are as profitable to the whole people as those made for public works. Whatever of the public revenue is devoted to the construction and improvement of great highways of commerce, to opening up harbors on the ocean or the lakes, to removing obstructions from the channel of rivers, or to aiding in the building of railroads where water routes can not be constructed, yields a larger return to the whole people than any other expenditures that are made by the Government. And the benefits are not temporary, but lasting; they come back to producer and consumer alike in a reduced transportation tax. What is there to show at the end of each fiscal year for the millions annually expended in maintaining the various departments of the Government? These expenditures are necessary and proper, but they are simply the living expenses of the Government. On the other hand, the money put into public improvements by which commerce is encouraged and promoted is a permanent investment and becomes a constant and continuing source of wealth to the country, bringing back returns to the pockets of the people year after year and adding to the prosperity of all.

I know, sir, that it has of late years become the fashion in some quarters to fiercely denounce appropriations of this character as immense jobs, as part of a "grab game," in which each Representative and Senator is interested only for the purpose of securing votes by obtaining for his district or State more than its share of what is called the "swag," and it is freely alleged that such appropriations are divided up more with reference to these personal interests than to the propriety or necessity of the expenditures made. It is far easier for these critics to make such charges than to investigate the facts, and they are not made by those who are most familiar with the wants and needs of the country. But Congress can not justify itself in declining to provide for public improvements demanded by the necessities of commerce from fear of an unfounded public outcry of this character any more than it can in making expenditures which are not shown to be necessary and advantageous. And the history of our country will show that Congress is just as apt to err in the direction of a mistaken economy with reference to needed and important public improvements as in the direction of unwise or extravagant expenditures.

The doctrine of internal improvements has had the sanction and approval of some of our ablest statesmen, as was conclusively shown by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his remarks in this body on July 1, 1884, upon the relation of national government to domestic commerce. The Senator at that time called attention to the first report of Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of internal improvements, made to the Senate April 4, 1808, in which a comprehensive and costly system of internal improvements was advocated as the best and surest means of increasing the national wealth and prosperity, and in which it was urged that good roads and canals were the chief strengtheners of the Union. After showing that Mr. Gallatin proposed for these purposes an expenditure of $20,000,000, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> It will be seen, therefore, that he proposes an expenditure for internal improvements alone, not reckoning any sum devoted to harbors either on the ocean or the lakes, equal to 14 per cent. of the entire national income, and equal to about 25 per cent. of the sum expended by the nation for all other purposes, exclusive of the public debt. * * * If we were to expend the same proportion of our revenue on this object to-day as was proposed by Gallatin in 1808, we should have devoted fifty-six and a half millions in 1882 to internal improvements alone.

As a nation we are growing in population and business and wealth. The settlements of our population extend from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the Gulf. Commerce is increasing yearly in volume and value. Railroads and civilization are pushing out in every direction, and the world is looking toward America as the nation of progress. Shall we as legislators, looking over the field of duty, sit here and say that we would like to remove all obstacles in the way of the natural movement of commerce; that we would like to cheapen transportation, so that farmers in the West and Northwest may be able to ship their products to a paying market; that we would like to provide a means by which our people might successfully compete in foreign markets, and thus profitably dispose of our surplus corn and wheat and beef and pork and butter and cheese and manufactures; but the Constitution does not in express terms authorize such legislation, and therefore we can not support the proposed measure of relief?

Mr. President, in my judgment we have the power to build this canal, this water way, and I trust we shall use the power for the public good. Can any man doubt that such a free water route as is proposed from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan would be a great public benefit? The nations to-day are engaged in a peaceful struggle for commercial supremacy on the seas, and for the trade of the world. Production seems to be in excess of consumption. The cry is hard times here and elsewhere in other lands. Men are idle for want of work and families are hungry for want of bread. What shall be done? It is our duty to consider the situation of affairs and do what we can to improve it. Shall we as a nation drop back and say to other nations engaged with us in the struggle for trade that we are out of the race? Shall we let the products of the American farmer and manufacturer rot and rust in the field and shop?

We can not afford to occupy such a position. The Constitution is not in the way, and our duty is clearly pointed out. It is to go forward and to do all that lies within our power to aid in developing the means of carrying on the trade and business of the people on the land and on the sea, so that we may be able at all times to find profitable markets for the surplus of our productions either at home or abroad.

Mr. President, a nation can not stand still. It is bound to go forward or to fall back. If we undertake to stand still and say we are doing well enough, let well enough alone, we make a serious mistake. While we are neglecting our opportunities other nations, full of ambition and enterprise, their statesmen looking carefully to the future and reaching out in every direction to promote the interests of their nations, will secure advantages which millions of money and generations of time may not suffice to overcome. It is our duty to adopt a policy which will open up new avenues of trade, cheapen the means of transportation, and enable our people to get out of the rut which results in overproduction. Business needs stimulation so that the people may feel that they can consume more. The South American trade should be secured to this country; the trade of Mexico should be secured to give additional markets for our wares. Our policy has too long been penny wise and pound foolish, and even to-day men are opposed to the proposed canal between the Mississippi and the lakes, our two great systems of internal water communication, though it is evident that this connection would give the Western farmer a better price for the products of his farm and would cheapen the food of the Eastern consumer.

Mr. President, too much has already been said on the floors of Congress and by the press of the country, by Legislatures and by conventions, by men of business, not politicians (who are generally charged with talking for votes if they say a word in behalf of the people), by men who know better than we do here what is needed, showing the merits of this proposed canal, to justify me in talking much longer in favor of the measure. The necessities of commerce demand this canal, and we should not hesitate to meet the demand by making an appropriation for the work.

What a grand country we have! Our coast line bounded by the two great oceans, the chain of lakes and the Gulf nearly surrounding us with water; with the mighty Father of Waters sweeping from north to south through the center of the continent, and bounded on both sides by the fertile lands of the Mississippi Valley, the most productive soil known to mortal man, stretching far and wide on each side. Mr. President, the system mapped out by nature in this country has left little for man to do to add to the opportunities for happiness and prosperity. It is an old saying that man made the city but God made the country. And, sir, in looking over this country and considering how it is laid out, with its variety of soil and climate and productions, with its lakes and rivers, I can but feel that it is the greatest country on earth as an abode for civilized man. A little work on the coast and the margins of the rivers and lakes, a few short canals, and the people of this country in every part are in position to take advantage of whatever may occur abroad to make a demand for their products, and are also assured of cheap transportation at home.

The United States has a great variety of climate, soil, and production, and the people therefore have diversity of labor and interests. The East has its manufactures of every kind, the South is rich in cotton, tobacco, and sugar, the Northern and Middle States in wheat and corn and hay and oats and stock, the West in minerals and stock and fruits and wine; in short, every section possesses the elements of wealth in productions peculiar to itself, some of which can not be profitably produced in any other section.

Our advanced civilization and tastes demand the productions of all sections to satisfy our needs and desires. Hence exchange is the business of millions of our people, every section sending its products to every other, and this makes up what is called the internal commerce of the country. This is the index to the life and prosperity and growth of the nation, and should be stimulated by every proper effort on our part.

Mr. President, there is another important view of this subject. To-day we are defenseless on our lake borders. We have, I believe, one little vessel retained upon the lakes as a warning to foreign nations that they must not encroach upon our rights. We have no protection for our cities upon the lakes, and very little anywhere upon our seacoast or upon the Gulf. Should not Congress provide for any needed defense? We have a Government arsenal at Rock Island, where every preparation is made for the manufacture of guns. Should not this arsenal be used in the construction of guns and of gunboats as well, to be used on the lakes or Gulf as necessity may require? And the construction of the Hennepin Canal, if of sufficient size, would enable such vessels, fully armed and equipped, to pass down the Mississippi to the Gulf coast, or through the canal to the lakes, and would make such means of defense always available to answer the calls of the nation wherever needed.

Mr. President, I despise the policy which controls this Government now and has controlled it in the past, and which has resulted in our almost helpless condition in so far as preparation for defense is concerned. We here in Congress do not agree upon the exact thing to do, and therefore do nothing. We drift along with no coast defenses, no flag upon the seas, no preparation to meet emergencies of war on land, or lake, or sea, that may at any time arise, with no assertion of a positive national foreign policy, and with an apparent sense of self-security that can only be likened to a strong man asleep unconscious of impending danger.

"In times of peace prepare for war." Let us construct these canals in the interest of national defense as well as of national prosperity. All these considerations call upon Congress to enter upon the work. Other nations are alert on the question of adopting every means for securing to the people cheap transportation. Germany, France, and England, all older in dealing with the subject of transportation than our country, have given attention to the construction of railroads and to the best method of regulating them, and are also giving attention to the importance of canals and are doing much in aid of their construction. Let us not close our eyes to the importance of such means of improvement.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment to this proposed amendment of the committee, in line 1146, to insert, after the word "at," the words "or above." That I propose to follow by another amendment, striking out in the same line and in the succeeding line the words "or between it and the city of Rock Island." I propose this amendment in order to make this paragraph consistent. It provides in a subsequent portion, as follows:

> Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War.

From this it would seem that it was the purpose of the committee to allow the Secretary of War a discretion to select one or the other of the routes that have been surveyed, or proposed, or talked about for the construction of this canal; but it will be observed that if we allow the text of this amendment as reported by the committee to stand it in effect confines the Secretary of War to the selection of one route; and in order to leave that discretion free in its action I move the amendments which I have suggested.

Mr. CULLOM. If I understand the amendment to be what the Senator from Iowa suggested to me a while ago, I believe we will consent to its adoption. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1146, after the word "at," it is proposed to insert "or above;" and after the word "river," in the same line, to strike out the words "or between it and the city of Rock Island;" so as to read:

For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $300,000.

Mr. CULLOM. We will consent to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I presume, sir, that while this bill is under consideration I must ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas it is generally understood that to-morrow, July 9, shall be devoted to the consideration of "objected executive nominations:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the doors of the Senate shall not be closed during the time that executive nominations are pending, discussed, or voted upon.

I expect there will be an objection to it, but it will be in order to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution?

Mr. GORMAN, Mr. FRYE, and others. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over and be printed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to know who objected to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FRYE. I objected, for one.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is enough.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I report back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the petition of Joseph Neumann, of California, praying that means be provided to enanable him to cause to have made a show-case for the preservation of the first flag made of American silk, presented by him to, and accepted by, Congress and deposited in the Smithsonian Institution, together with the full history of its creation; and also a resolution submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] on the same subject, with the statement that the committee think that this appropriation can not come out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and they wish that the resolution, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2126) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovell, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Rules, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 2822) providing for the purchase of a site and the construction of a wharf in Astoria, Oreg., for the use of the Light-House Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, introduced a bill (S. 2823) for the relief of Anna M. Marshall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2824) for the relief of the heirs of J. W. J. Moore, of Leonardtown, Md., deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EVARTS and Mr. GEORGE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That Dr. E. H. Bryan be permitted to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce inserting the clauses from line 1134 to line 1174, inclusive, as amended.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment. The Senate is aware of what is to transpire this afternoon. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the chairman of the committee will go on with this bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As I understand, we are considering the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me a moment, I should like to make a correction in the report of the proceedings of yesterday which appears in the RECORD of to-day. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] yesterday, when the discussion of the appropriation for the Sturgeon Bay canal was under consideration, is reported to have made these remarks, and I remember the remarks myself:

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will ask the attention of the Senate upon this item of the bill for only a few moments. Until yesterday I had given no thought whatever to this proposition, for I had not known until I read the bill that it had been considered even by the committee.

In some brief remarks which I addressed to the Senate subsequently I am reported as having said:

Mr. MCMILLAN. This amendment was inserted by the Committee on Commerce on the representation of the Senators from Wisconsin as to the importance and necessity of this great public improvement, representing the interests of the people of the State of Wisconsin, not representing any company or any private interests.

I used the word "Senator" instead of "Senators" as reported. The word in the plural as used here would include both the Senators from Wisconsin. My allusion was to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], who introduced the amendment which was adopted by the committee, and inserted in the bill. I merely make the correction so that the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] may appear to have been correct in accordance with my own.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose under the circumstances to discuss at all the constitutional aspects of this question. I have had occasion before, more than once, to state my views in regard to the unconstitutionality of the proposed construction of this canal. I do not believe that Congress has the right to construct a canal inside of a State. I do not believe that the power is given to it by the Constitution, and I think that is the settled and established doctrine of the Democratic party, and has been since its foundations. If we can go into a State and construct a canal, either in connection with rivers or without any connection with them, then the line of demarkation between the national improvement and the local improvement is absolutely obliterated, and that is the end of that question. But I do not propose now, under the circumstances, to discuss that proposition.

Here is an appropriation of $300,000 in a river and harbor bill to construct a canal which will cost in the neighborhood of $7,000,000. That is the estimate of the engineers; and it is to be a canal of such dimensions, of such lift-locks that engineers of ability have doubted, not that such a canal could be constructed, but that anything like $7,000,000 ever would defray the expenses of the construction.

If the advantages and benefits to be derived from the construction of this canal are so immense and undoubted as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has depicted them to be, why is not this measure brought here fairly and squarely in a separate bill, as was the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, as have been all the great works of improvement in this country? Why is $300,000 injected into a river and harbor bill for an immense work of this sort? It is to commit the Government of the United States to the construction of this work. It is the entering-wedge, the simple forerunner of the expenditure of $6,694,000, I believe, as stated in the estimate of the engineers.

There are three routes proposed for this canal: the Marais d'Osier route, which is 64 miles in length; the Watertown route, which is 65 miles in length; and the Rock Island route, which has been selected by the engineers, which is 75 miles in length, and the estimated cost of the construction of the canal and feeder, including right of way, is $6,672,890.67. The estimated cost of maintenance and ordinary repairs, annually, is $94,820, and the dredges $36,000. One feeder is 37 miles in length, costing $1,664,117.52; but the right of way and the cost of the feeder included under the estimate, exclusive of the maintenance and ordinary repairs and dredging, is $6,672,890.67.

I submit that a work of such enormous magnitude and expense, no matter what may be its advantages or the arguments which can be made in behalf of it, should not be injected in a river and harbor bill under a paltry appropriation of $300,000; and I want the Senate to understand that in voting for this insignificant appropriation of $300,000 they are pledging this Government in the beginning to an estimated expenditure of nearly $7,000,000.

A great deal is said about the disposition of the people of Illinois to give to the people of the entire Union a water way or a canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River free of any toll. In the communication of the governor of Illinois, Governor Hamilton, transmitting to the President of the United States the act of the Illinois Legislature ceding to the United States on certain conditions the Illinois and Michigan Canal, we find the following:

By acts of Congress—

Says Governor Hamilton, and I ask the attention of such Senators as desire to know the history of this improvement to the following:

By acts of Congress of the years 1822 and 1827 there was granted to the State of Illinois land for a canal connecting the Illinois River with the southern bend of Lake Michigan, and 90 feet of land on each side thereof; also a quantity of land, equal to one-half of five sections in width, on each side of said canal, from one end thereof to the other, with the proviso, "That the said canal, when completed, shall be and forever remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States or persons in their service passing through the same;" and that in case of failure to build this canal as required in these acts "the State should pay to the United States the amount of any land previously sold."

The gift and acceptance created a legal obligation on the part of the State to forever keep the canal in repair and open as a public water way for the purposes indicated in the acts of Congress, and this obligation can not be avoided at the will or convenience of the State. That the canal must be kept in operation forever is imperative, unless the State be released from this obligation. Nor does the obligation work a hardship to the State. It has not proven a "bad bargain," but a profitable one. The entire cost of the canal in its construction is, principal and interest, $6,557,681.50. The amount of moneys received by the State from the sale of canal lands given by the United States is $5,886,039.68. This added to the net earnings of the canal, namely, $2,933,691.74, makes an aggregate of lands and lots sold with the net earnings of the canal the sum of $8,819,731.42 realized by the State, which shows a balance of $2,262,049.92 clear profits which were paid into the State treasury, which is more than one-third of its entire cost. Beside this sum of money, the canal itself and many millions worth of real estate, part of said canal lands, yet belong to the State.

The whole northern part of the State has been greatly improved by the construction of the canal; Chicago, Ottawa, and all the cities between them, have been laid out and built upon canal lands; and although the canal was constructed through a wild, uninhabited country, yet to-day it is truthfully said that "the assessed valuation of the four counties through which the canal passes is greater than the fifty counties south of the capital." The above was the debit and credit sides between the State and canal in 1879, and they have not materially changed since, as the appropriations of the General Assembly of 1879 and 1881, in aid of the canal, were never expended, and the canal has been self-sustaining. This statement of the financial condition of the canal shows that the State can well afford to keep it in repair, as by their contract with the United States they are bound to do. * * * There is no doubt, however, that a cession to the United States Government of the canal, and the lands remaining unsold, and an acceptance thereof, would virtually release the State from the aforesaid obligation.

There is the milk in this cocoanut. Illinois has made nearly two and one-half million dollars by this transaction, but desires to be released from the obligation of keeping this canal in repair.

It goes without saying that the days of canals are past; that railways have become the system of transportation for the country. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is to-day unable to pay for the repairs caused by the last freshet upon it, because the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has been built even upon the opposite side of the river. The Lynchburg Canal, upon the banks of the James River in Virginia, has been given up, and grass is growing in it, because a railroad was built down the banks of that river.

Mr. KENNA. The superintendent of the Canada Canal says that that can not be maintained for the same reason.

Mr. VEST. As the Senator from West Virginia says, the superintendent of the Canada Canal says that that can not be maintained on account of the construction of a railroad.

By looking at the map it will be seen that the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad runs along the Rock Island route where it is proposed now to construct this canal. The result will be inevitable that this canal can never become even a material factor in competition with a railroad built along the same route.

Yet we are expected to go into this improvement upon this sort of data, after Illinois has reaped these benefits, for her own governor says that Illinois can afford to comply with the contract made with the General Government and keep this canal in repair. Yet in order to escape the obligation to keep it in repair and maintain it he advises that this act of the Legislature should be passed, ceding it to the Government of the United States. This is all of it.

I propose to call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment in order that for one I may record my vote against it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate in discussing this proposition. I have discussed it several times in the Senate, and my colleague has discused it very thoroughly to-day.

But I desire to call the attention of the Senator who has just taken his seat to the proposition he states, that canals are being done away with and that railroads have taken the place of water transportation. I have known that Senator to be very earnest for a great appropriation for the Mississippi River. Railroads run along on either side of that river. So it is in regard to the different rivers of the country, and that argument is not a good one. A canal may be used in the same way. It may be just as efficient and just as important.

The fact that a certain railroad does run along the line of this canal is one of the facts in this case that if admitted to have weight becomes an objection to the passage of any bill for the purpose of opening the canal. That always has been the case. Wherever it is possible to prevent the opening of a water route by a railroad that runs along the line of it, as a matter of course it will be done.

I have always found right here in the Senate Chamber the same argument made, that railroads were taking the place of water transportation. The same argument is made by those who own this very railroad.

I only wish to say that this route is an important link connecting the Illinois and the Mississippi Rivers, which will give us a route to the East. It will give a route from Chicago into the Mississippi River by water; and it would not injure the great city of the Senator's State. I know that we do not have very many friends down there for this canal. It would not affect the city of Saint Louis in the slightest degree. The Illinois River would continue to throw its water down into the Mississippi River just as it does now; and a few bushels of wheat would be taken there, which, as the Senator says, might be placed on railroads. He says the railroads have taken the place of water transportation there. I do not think it would hurt Saint Louis very much.

That is the milk in the cocoanut, Mr. President, and not the fact that the State of Illinois wants to get rid of the expense of maintaining this canal.

I hope the time will come when the people of this country will, wherever it is necessary to have cheap transportation, provide for that thing, whether by canal or otherwise.

The objection which has been made sometimes to this project that the Constitution might be infringed has been discussed fully at different times. If the Government of the United States can build a railroad, the Government of the United States can build a canal. If the Government of the United States can dig out a river that is not navigable to make it navigable, the Government of the United States can dig out a canal.

The time has passed for argument in reference to the power of the Congress of the United States to appropriate money for this purpose, because we have done it so often, not under the name of a canal, but doing precisely the same thing by the use of public or Government money.

The fact that $300,000 is appropriated in this bill is for the purpose of commencing this work. That is true; nobody denies that. If the work ought not to be commenced, then no money ought to be appropriated; but if the work is one that is valuable to this country and ought to be commenced, then the money ought to be appropriated; and why not upon this bill as upon any other bill? I can not see why it should not be provided for upon a bill appropriating money for rivers and harbors as well as upon any other bill or as well as in a separate bill.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted. I shall not detain the Senate any longer. I merely wish to say that this is a work of importance to the whole country, East, West, North, and South, and not unimportant to many of the constituents of the Senator from Missouri who is opposed to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is very important that we should have a short executive session; and in a very few minutes the Senate will adjourn anyway in consequence of the death of a member of the House. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think we can have a vote on this amendment now.

Mr. FRYE. Let us take a vote on the amendment. It will save two hours' discussion to-morrow if we can get a vote to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. We can not get a vote on it this evening.

Mr. FRYE. If we can get a vote now, it will save a long discussion to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will waive any discussion of the matter if a vote can be taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. If a vote can be had immediately I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think it practicable to get a vote this evening.

Mr. FRYE. The discussion has stopped.

Mr. BUTLER. I am going to vote for the amendment; but possibly I may wish to explain the reasons why I do so. I am not going to make a set speech, but it is now within ten minutes of the time when we have informally agreed to adjourn and we could not get through with a vote by yeas and nays in that time. I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri will prevail.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the amendment is to be further debated I hope we shall not have an executive session at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. Then let us adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. We have spent a great deal of time in the discussion of the bill, and I desire to have it brought to a close. I have been as considerate in regard to the discussion of matters as I could consistently be, and I have yielded to every request.

Mr. HARRIS. Is this question debatable?

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope we shall remain in session as long as we can for the consideration of the bill to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I raise the point of order that the question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. CONGER. Pending that I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now in the execution of its order, and the motion can not be entertained.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

R. A. Perkins to be postmaster at Canton, Fulton County, Illinois.

The last-named confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the nomination of R. A. Perkins to be postmaster at Canton, Ill., vice C. E. Snively, whose removal is proposed, respectfully submit the following report:

The papers furnished the Committee by the Post-Office Department indicate that the removal of C. E. Snively is proposed in consequence of certain charges affecting his official conduct preferred against him. Some of them were trivial complaints, of which the Department does not appear to have taken notice, and therefore need not now be considered.

It appears from the papers that Hon. N. E. WORTHINGTON, the Representative from the Canton district, filed in the Department two or three letters addressed to him making these charges, and that two affidavits were forwarded by R. A. Perkins, the nominee, who asked for an investigation of the charges and of the management of the office. Whereupon Inspector L. A. Kirkwood was sent to Canton to make an investigation, being furnished with a list of witnesses by Mr. WORTHINGTON. The inspector found the accounts of the office in good shape. In his report he gives the statements of those making the original charges, but presents little or no additional evidence, and expresses the opinion that the charges are true, and that Snively "is hardly the proper person to hold the responsible position of postmaster."

The files of the Department disclose the fact that Postmaster Snively wrote to the chief inspector at Chicago expressing his dissatisfaction, for good reasons, with Inspector Kirkwood's method of conducting this investigation, and asking, in justice to himself, that a full and fair investigation be made by the chief inspector himself or by other competent persons. This request was not granted, but his removal was promptly proposed, and he has therefore been compelled to submit his defense to the Senate, and has filed fourteen affidavits with the committee.

The charges upon which this removal appears to have been proposed were as follows:

1. That Postmaster Snively improperly opened a letter addressed to the Department and containing bids for carrying the mail, with the alleged purpose of ascertaining the contents for the benefit of a rival bidder.

2. That Postmaster Snively locked his assistant, Miss Ida Naylor, in the post-office one evening after office hours, and compelled her to disclose the contents of a letter received by her that day from Representative WORTHINGTON.

The first charge rests solely upon the affidavit of Thomas Cooper and James McMahon, who made one of the bids contained in the envelope, and the statement of William H. Hemenover, who made the other, they charging that Snively opened the envelope, as they believe, to ascertain the amount of their bids and communicated the same to a competitor who was his "political crony."

It appears from the evidence that Hemenover's son, who was a mail messenger and had the run of the office, improperly placed the bids in question in an official penalty envelope which no one but the postmaster had a right to use and laid it upon the latter's desk during his absence; that when Snively returned he picked up the envelope to take out the bids and put them with others he had received and his report, as required by his instructions; that finding the envelope sealed, and supposing it had been sealed by his clerk, who did not know about the other bids, he opened it and found the bids were not in the blanks supplied by the Department, and were folded together instead of being in separate sealed envelopes, as required; that he went directly to the parties and explained the matter, and asked them to put in new bids in proper shape.

Thus far there is no dispute as to the facts. Cooper and Hemenover allege that they declined to put in new bids when requested, while Snively swears that they did so at once and that he forwarded them to the Department, and refers to the records of the Department to sustain his statement. Snively shows that he had no reason to suppose that any one but his clerk had sealed the envelope, and that as soon as he learned otherwise he communicated the facts to the parties, who seemed to be satisfied and made no complaints for several weeks afterward. He also meets the charge that he communicated the contents of the bids to others by submitting an affidavit by the successful bidder, M. Higbie, who denies that Snively or any other person directly or indirectly communicated to him the contents of the bids.

The committee find that this charge, so far as it imputes any improper act or motive on the part of Mr. Snively, is not sustained, and that he acted in an honorable manner throughout the transaction.

The second charge was made by Miss Naylor's father, Amos Naylor, whom Inspector Kirkwood reports not to be a man of good reputation. The testimony shows that the postmaster had an interview with Miss Naylor on the evening in question, the only other person present being W. H. Shaw, a friend of Snively's. The door of the office was locked, because it has a spring lock, and was always kept locked. The only controversy is as to whether Snively attempted to compel Miss Naylor to disclose the contents of a private letter as charged.

When the matter began to be talked about Miss Naylor gave Snively a statement denying the charge in the most positive terms. Inspector Kirkwood secured a statement from her to the effect that Snively asked her if she was "doing any undermining work," but not saying that he said anything about Mr WORTHINGTON'S letter as charged.

On the other hand Mr. Snively swears that Miss Naylor was not detained against her wishes or treated otherwise than with due courtesy, and was not questioned about the letter; that she began to talk about it and he refused to hear about it; and that the interview related solely to certain matters which involved her honesty and integrity as an employé.

Col. A. B. Smith makes affidavit that he was consulted by Snively concerning the matters referred to, and that the interview was had by his advice as a friend of both parties, and that it related solely to Miss Naylor's integrity in the discharge of her official duties. Also, that she wrote the statement given to Snively, denying the charges publicly made, at Smith's suggestion and voluntarily. This statement is corroborated in an affidavit by W. H. Shaw, who was present at the interview.

The committee find that the second charge as made is untrue, and that it is without other foundation than the fact that the postmaster had an interview with his assistant on the evening in question in relation to other matters than those mentioned in the charge.

From all the testimony in the case the committee is satisfied that the charges against Snively are untrue and malicious, and were made solely for the purpose of securing his removal; but as he does not seek to retain the office, and desires only to be protected against the injurious effects of these unjust charges, we believe that justice to him demands the adoption of this report by the Senate and the removal therefrom of the injunction of secrecy.

If that be done, we recommend that the nomination of R. A. Perkins be confirmed, no objection having been made thereto.

The following report of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the nomination of Henry W. Clendenin to be postmaster at Springfield, Sangamon County, Illinois, confirmed by the Senate on the 21st of June last, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the nomination of Henry W. Clendenin to be postmaster at Springfield, Ill., vice Paul Selby, resigned, respectfully report:

That on the 8th of March last the same nomination was made to the Senate and the removal of Paul Selby proposed; that the committee investigated the grounds upon which Selby's removal was then proposed, and found that, so far as appeared from the files of the Department relating to the case, there were no reasons for the proposed removal other than those of political nature, based solely on the fact that Selby had been the editor of a Republican paper and that as such editor he was an "offensive partisan" within the meaning of the Vilas circular.

The papers furnished to the committee from the files of the Department show that Mr. Clendenin was recommended for appointment as a staunch Democrat and because of his services as editor of one of the leading Democratic papers of Illinois, and as a member of the Democratic State central committee.

No objections to his confirmation have been received by the committee, and we report the nomination back with the recommendation that it be confirmed

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate July 3, 1886.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 8, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, as follows:

Almighty and everlasting God, we humbly beseech Thee to sanctify to our spiritual profit the bereavement which has befallen this House in the death of one of its members this day. In this solemn hush and pause, as we stand by the coffin side in our thought, may wise and pure and holy feelings possess every breast, and may the members of this House form just estimates of the value of life and the solemn issues thereof; and may all feelings which unbefit be banished from our minds and hearts.

Grant that Thy pity and tenderness may be extended to the members of the stricken household, and may that comfort which alone comes through Jesus Christ and His gospel console and uphold them in their affliction. All of which we ask in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have a correction made. I find that the name of Mr. SMALLS was called yesterday and no excuse for his absence was offered. It is proper to state that he has indefinite leave of absence of the House, on account of sickness; and I would like this statement to appear.

The SPEAKER. The statement will appear in the RECORD.

The Journal was then approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A PAIR.

Mr. SWINBURNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief personal explanation, which I think is due to myself in connection with the vote on the proposition to inaugurate the statue of Liberty Enlightening the World in New York Harbor.

On the 25th day of June I made a pair with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GLASS], which extended for some time after the vote on this proposition was taken. I find that my name was not recorded as having been paired with him on that question; and I would like to have the statement made so as to show the reason for my not voting. In this connection I ask to have read a letter from Mr. GLASS, which will explain this matter fully.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., July 7, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have learned that some of the New York press have censured you for not having voted on the proposition to incorporate in the sundry civil appropriation bill an appropriation for the statue of Liberty Enlightening the World. It affords me pleasure to say that you were paired with me at the time the vote was taken, and that I would have voted against it if I had been present.

I am, very truly,

P. T. GLASS.

Hon. JOHN SWINBURNE.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM H. COLE.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House the death of my late colleague, Dr. WILLIAM H. COLE, of Maryland, who died this morning at his lodgings in this city at half past 7 o'clock. At some future time I shall ask the House to pay proper tribute to the memory of the deceased; and now offer for immediate adoption the resolutions I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM H. COLE, late a Representative from the State of Maryland.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a select joint committee, consisting of seven members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to their place of burial, and the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for properly carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased that the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before the announcement of the result of the vote on the last resolution the Chair will state that during the day he will name the select committee and communicate the list to the friends of the deceased member.

The announcement of the vote was then made; and the House accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m.) adjourned.

SEIZURES OF AMERICAN VESSELS IN FOREIGN WATERS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, so far as in his opinion it may not be inconsistent with the public interest, to inform the Senate of all facts in his possession or that of the Department of State in regard to the seizure or detention in any foreign ports of any American vessels, and the pretext or alleged cause for such seizure, and all correspondence relating to the same, and what efforts have been made to procure redress for such seizures and to prevent the recurrence thereof.

Mr. VEST. Let that go over.

Mr. HOAR. It is a mere request for information. I hope the Senator will allow it to pass.

Mr. VEST. I want to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over.

CONFINEMENT OF AMERICANS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CALL. I present a resolution to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to direct the representatives of the United States to the Government of Mexico to investigate the truth of statements made in the newspapers that citizens of the United States are confined in Mexican dungeons without trial for alleged offenses against the laws of Mexico, and that their final trial has been postponed without cause. That if such statements shall be found to be true, the Government of the United States shall demand the trial of such citizens and their humane treatment during confinement, and shall make provision for their defense and their release from confinement where no sufficient cause for their detention shall be found. That the President of the United States shall, if he shall consider it necessary, be requested to institute negotiations with the Government of Mexico for a convention to secure a fair trial without unnecessary delay of citizens of the United States in Mexico who may be charged with violating the laws of Mexico.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the reading of the newspaper extract which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The extract will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN MEXICAN DUNGEONS—AMERICAN CITIZENS IMPRISONED FOR MONTHS WITHOUT TRIAL.

[By telegraph to the Herald.]

CHIHUAHUA, MEX., July 4, 1886.

Mr. Merkley, station agent here of the Mexican Central Railway Company, and an American citizen, some time ago struck a Mexican who grossly insulted and attacked him in his office while in the discharge of his official duties. The Mexican, getting the worst of the affair, went before the alcalde and lodged a complaint. Merkley was at once arrested and incarcerated in a foul dungeon, where a number of other malefactors were confined. Every legal means have been exhausted by Americans to effect his release, but they have proved fruitless, and no satisfactory explanation is vouchsafed by the Mexican authorities for refusing to take action in Merkley's case.

AN UNWELCOME PASSENGER.

A Pullman car porter, who silenced a Mexican who was raising a disturbance in a car in this city several days ago, is now being concealed by railroad men along the Mexican Central, to prevent his seizure and indefinite imprisonment without trial.

There are now a number of Americans in the loathsome dungeons of this city who have been incarcerated for months without a hearing, and present a pitiable sight in their ragged and emaciated condition. The American residents of this city are highly incensed and alarmed at the arbitrary and unjust action exhibited by the Mexican authorities toward citizens of the United States, and it is reliably stated that many will leave here until our State Department adopts a more vigorous policy toward guaranteeing protection to its law-abiding citizens in Mexico. The American consul here is severely censured, and is openly accused of siding with the Mexican officials against his countrymen. He has on no occasion exerted himself in their behalf when frivolous charges were preferred against them and they were thrust into Mexican prisons.

The resolution was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], which comes over under objection, will be laid before the Senate. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER as follows:

Whereas it is generally understood that to-morrow, July 9, shall be devoted to the consideration of "objected" executive nominations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the doors of the Senate shall not be closed during the time that executive nominations are pending, discussed, or voted upon.

Mr. HARRIS. I raise the question of order upon that resolution. It proposes to change the rules of the Senate, and does not conform to the rule requiring notice, &c.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon of the Senator from Tennessee. I did not hear the question of order that he made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee raises the point of order that the requisite notice has not been given under the rule and the requisite specification required by the rule. The Chair is not advised upon that point. Has the Senator from Virginia given the notice the rule prescribes?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am free to say that I am not advised myself. If the point is well taken I am ready to yield, but I have not understood yet that the Senate can not make a rule or change a rule by a majority vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XL will be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The notice was given yesterday. The resolution was offered yesterday.

Mr. HARRIS. The rule requires a written notice specifically stating the exact change of the rule proposed to be made, and then the rule itself must be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XL.

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I can see there that I should possibly have given a day's notice before proposing to change the rule, but I should like to have the rule read that the resolution proposes to change. I do not think the rule will be found there.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the rule in respect to executive sessions be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule respecting executive sessions will be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Tennessee has just assumed that I am changing a rule. I want to know what rule I am proposing to change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second clause of Rule XXXVI will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXXVI.

* * * * * * *

2. When acting upon confidential or executive business the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the chief clerk, the principal legislative clerk, the executive clerk, the minute and journal clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the assistant doorkeeper, and such other officers as the presiding officer shall think necessary; and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is still another rule relating to the matter, but it is not necessary to read it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not understand yet that I am proposing to change that rule. I have offered a resolution that is to cover one single matter before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS (in his seat). That suspends the other rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish the Senator from Vermont would state what he proposes to state from his seat and not violate the rules himself by speaking from his chair; for a fundamental rule of the Senate is that when a Senator proposes to speak he shall rise from his seat and address the Chair.

I do not mean to do anything more in this matter than to call it to the attention of the Senate; that is all; and I am going to do it on any and every occasion that I can.

I believe this is just one single endeavor to defeat by a method that does not commend itself to me the opening of the doors of the Senate and allowing what we call executive business to be considered here with the constituency of this country to know all about it. I have asked here——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, is this question debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have asked for five months for a vote, and I have been unable to get it. Now, the Senator from Tennessee says I am proposing to change a rule. Who makes the rules? Does not a majority of the Senate make the rules?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that the question is not debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon, I do not want to be allowed to go on if I am out of order.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I am more interested in something that is to follow to-day than I am in this matter. The purpose of my resolution was to promote what I believe to be the right in the Senate Chamber, and I do not believe that the wrong would prevail if these doors were opened.

I do not, therefore, with all due deference to my friend from Tennessee, propose to avail myself of unanimous consent to proceed, because I think that would be consuming time that I can better give to the consideration of the matter that we shall have in hand this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order seems to be well taken in reference to the proceedings of yesterday upon the resolution. No specified rule has been named in the resolution of the Senator from Virginia. The resolution will lie upon the table. The Senator can give the required notice at any time. The Senator at his pleasure can give the notice under the rule. The next business in order is the Calendar under the rule adopted on Wednesday last.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well, sir.

ERNEST H. WARDWELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case passed over informally yesterday will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell."

Mr. GEORGE. I move that Senate bill 372 be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills must be taken up in order. The rule under which we are acting requires that. The bill to which the Senator from Mississippi refers will be reached in due time.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought unanimous consent was given yesterday that Senate bill 372 should be considered this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to take them in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1455 is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It was read yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to Earnest H. Wardwell, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a captain and assistant quartermaster in the United States Army from the 11th day of March to the 18th day of May, 1865; and also the three months' additional pay proper as first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Second Regiment North Carolina Union Volunteers (white), the same as allowed to all volunteer officers under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the report read and see what the difficulty is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON March 10, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell, beg leave to report that as the facts in this case are set forth in a House report of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Forty-eighth Congress, that report is adopted as their own, while some additional facts are presented to the Senate:

"Ernest H. Wardwell, in May, 1861, enlisted in the Sixth Massachusetts Volunteers, and served for more than three months without pay. On September 7 of the same year he enlisted as a private in the Twenty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteers. November 8, 1862, he was commissioned second lieutenant, Second Louisiana (Union) Volunteers. April 4, 1863, he resigned on account of sickness. February 5, 1864, he was commissioned first lieutenant and quartermaster Second North Carolina (Union) Volunteers. February 23, 1865, he was mustered out to accept a commission which had been promised him as captain and assistant quartermaster, in which grade he was confirmed by the Senate March 11, 1865. His commission, dated April 15, 1865, was forwarded to him May 11, and was accepted May 18. He was honorably mustered out of service July 28, 1865.

"From this record it appears that Captain Wardwell had an honorable though not continuous service of over three years.

"He claims that he should receive pay from March 11, 1865, to May 18, 1865, and also three months' extra pay under the act of March 3, 1865.

"There was a certain delay between March 11, 1865, when Captain Wardwell was confirmed by the Senate, and May 11, when his commission was sent to him. For this period of delay he thinks he ought to receive the pay of his rank, because he resigned his lieutenancy to accept the commission of captain which had been promised him, and was present and ready to receive his commission at the date of his confirmation. It appears, however, that in addition to the time usually required for the making out and signature of the commission there was a further delay, caused by the assassination of President Lincoln, April 14. By law and regulations an officer does not begin to draw pay until he has received and accepted his commission and has taken the oath. Unfortunate circumstances caused a delay of some weeks to Captain Wardwell in the receipt of his commission, and it seems not unreasonable to allow him pay during this period of waiting, because he resigned his lieutenancy on the positive information that he had been appointed a captain, and he was present and was ready to assume his new duties.

"The act of March 3, 1865, grants three months' extra pay to officers then in commission and who should continue in service to the close of the war. Captain Wardwell was mustered out February 23, 1865, and was not confirmed by the Senate as captain till March 11, and only accepted his commission on the 18th of May, so that he was not in service on the 3d of March, 1865, and could not legally draw the three months' extra pay.

"But as Captain Wardwell, after being in the Army nearly three years, resigned for the sole purpose of receiving his new commission, and was present and ready to be mustered in under it, he may not improperly be considered as constructively in the service on the 3d of March, 1865, and, therefore, entitled to three months' extra pay.

"The committee, therefore, report that the bill should pass."

In addition to the reasons given in the above report for the passage of the bill, the committee would state that it appears from the evidence submitted that one reason of the delay experienced by Captain Wardwell in the receipt of his commission was caused by a mistake in the Department of War, whereby the commission was sent to Oakland, Cal., instead of the post-office of the same name in Maryland. Captain Wardwell reported promptly for duty and notified the Department that he would await orders at the latter place, but his commission did not reach him until it went to and was returned from California.

In view of Captain Wardwell's meritorious services and of the circumstances surrounding his case the committee regard him as entitled to the relief he begs for, and they recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I used to know a good many Vermont officers who were in substantially the same predicament; that is, they did not come within the general law in the changes of commissions and in the intervals between one commission and another; and in the times when they used to bring the matter to my attention I thought, and told them so, that no special law could be passed of this kind, but if Congress thought fit to make a general law that would apply to all officers alike under similar circumstances that would be one thing.

I should be glad to have the committee explain somewhat more fully and at large how this gentleman's case differs, except for the few days when the commission was going around the post-office, from that of hundreds of other officers in whose service there were these breaks but who continued to serve faithfully, not only the three years, but four years, and who took later commissions but who did not get the amount of money that this gentleman will get by the bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. I think, and the committee thought, that this was an exceptional case. In the first place, Captain Wardwell served three months as a volunteer without any pay at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can you explain how that could be?

Mr. HAMPTON. He volunteered on the staff of some officer in the early part of the war and served for three months. I have not the papers to show how it was, but he did serve for three months without pay. He then resigned a lieutenancy, having been assured that he was appointed a captain. He was appointed and was confirmed, but owing to the assassination of President Lincoln there was a delay in signing his commission and sending it to him.

He came here and reported that he was ready for duty, and said that he would be at Oakland, Md., to receive the orders of the Department; but when his commission was signed, instead of being sent to Oakland, in Maryland, it was sent to Oakland, in California, and it was several months before it reached him, and he was thus kept out of it for several months.

The committee thought in view of those facts and the additional fact that he had been a most gallant and meritorious officer, that he should receive the three months' pay. It will only involve an expenditure of from $300 to $500; and while it does not, as I admit, come technically within the purview of the law, I take it that we should here, in cases of this sort, act as a great court of equity. If there is a man who is entitled to the benefits that would come from an equitable adjustment of his claim, I think it is Captain Wardwell.

I feel a very great interest in this matter because it so happened that when this case was first presented to the Military Committee it was referred to me, and I not having all the papers which I subsequently received reported it adversely. When my attention was afterward called to it and the papers came from the other House, I found that I had done Captain Wardwell, as I thought, a very gross injustice and I had the case recommitted; I had all the papers submitted to the committee; and, upon their review of the papers, I was authorized to make this favorable report.

I do not propose to detain the Senate any longer.

Mr. HARRISON. I think I ought to say that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs was not a unanimous one. For one I think I am inclined to be extremely liberal in dealing with officers and soldiers of the war. However, the proposition here is to pay an officer who was not discharging duty, but who was living at Oakland, in the State of Maryland, a summer resort on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, to which place he had gone under the promise, he said, that he would be appointed as captain. Some delay in getting his commission was caused, perhaps by delay in issuing it and probably by mistake in mailing it to Oakland, Cal.

I do not think this is a case where the Congress of the United States should pay the salary of captain and quartermaster to Mr. Wardwell during the time when he was waiting for his commission. There was no service rendered at all during that interval of time. If there were previously three months in which he rendered service and for which he received no pay, I agree that the Senator from South Carolina is entirely right in saying that for that three months in which he rendered service, if there was such a period, he ought to be paid; but for the period of the delay of his commission it seemed to me upon the committee, and seems to me now, that there is no reasonable claim upon the Government for compensation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire simply to add to what the Senator from Indiana has said that I have uniformly in committee and out of it opposed this bill, and I do not believe that there is one particle of merit in it of legal right or equitable right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.. Shall the bill pass? [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide; and the ayes were 29——

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BECK. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. We are both engaged on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. CHACE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] has a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved case on the Calendar will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. COKE. The bill can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under objection.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill passed over yesterday will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. I find upon an examination of the law that the amendments I proposed yesterday, which were intended to extend the benefits of this bill to the Territories, were not sufficient to accomplish that purpose.

The act in relation to agricultural colleges, which is referred to in the first section of the bill, is entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," but upon examination I find that the Territories are only mentioned in the title of the act, and that there is no provision in the body of it for extending its benefits to the Territories. I therefore move as an amendment an additional section.

Mr. PLATT. May I suggest right here that I understand there are one or two supplemental acts? The provisions of that act were extended to some Territory, perhaps to two Territories. I have not examined the matter carefully.

Mr. HARRISON. I examined yesterday with such care as I could in the Senate, and I found no such laws. If there be such, however, this amendment will not be out of harmony with them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say a word after it is read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the provisions and benefits of this act shall apply to the agricultural colleges which have been or may hereafter be established in any of the Territories of the United States under the laws thereof: Provided, That the average attendance of pupils upon the instruction of such college for the year preceding its application for the benefits of this act shall not have been less than fifty.

Mr. HARRISON. I am informed by a very intelligent gentleman who is interested in this form of education in Dakota, that that Territory has established an agricultural college, and has appropriated to sustain it $175,000. The money has been raised wholly by taxation, no part of it being proceeds of any public lands that have been sold. I have framed this amendment so as to give to the institution in Dakota the benefit of an experimental station, and also so as to extend it to any other Territory which shall establish an agricultural college. In order that the appropriation might not be made available unless the institution had some substantial foundation, I have limited it to such as had during the preceding year an attendance of fifty students.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I wish I could flatter myself that I could have the attention of those Senators at least whose States have established agricultural colleges.

I think this bill, wise and prudent as may be the motive of it, is defective in its general characteristics. I make no objection to it that it calls for a possible expenditure of $690,000 a year.

Mr. PLATT. For all time.

Mr. HAWLEY. For all time. I do not raise that objection. I desire to call the attention of the Senate, however, to the fact as emphasizing the necessity for a little consideration of the measure.

Let us see upon what general principles we have gone in this matter so far. In 1862 we passed the well-known act providing for the establishment of agricultural colleges. It was in the form of a direct grant of a certain quantity of land, 30,000 acres for each Senator and Representative, to the several States. It provided for the manner of locating and selling the scrip for those lands and for the expenditures in managing and selling the land, and all that matter of detail which I need not rehearse. Then it provided that all the moneys derived from the sale of the lands should be set aside and the interest inviolably appropriated—I will quote now literally—by each State which may take and claim the benefit of this act, to the endowment, support, and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe—

Note that, Mr. President—in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life.

Then it proceeds in section 5 to say that the grant of land and scrip, this donation to the States, is made upon certain conditions, to the number of seven here, and to these provisions the previous assent of the several States by legislative act is required as a condition precedent of their receiving the grant and applying the proceeds thereof.

I think that act was wisely drawn if the Government was to go into the business at all of establishing agricultural colleges. It donated a sufficient sum of money to give a very respectable foundation for those institutions. In a large proportion of the States that money was not wisely managed, not to say grossly and almost criminally squandered. Not one dollar of it is remaining in many States. Others disposed of it fairly well. Others husbanded it until they have almost unlimited resources. Cornell University, Michigan University at Ann Arbor, and one or two others located the lands wisely, held them until they rose greatly in value, and have made wealthy universities out of the generous grant.

Some of the agricultural colleges answer all the purposes of this pending bill by the chemical departments thereof; others do not. In my own State the Sheffield Scientific School is the beneficiary of this grant. It has, in addition to this Federal grant, the most generous donation from the late Mr. Sheffield and others, is a well-established and most admirable scientific school, instructing in agricultural chemistry and in a wide range of other branches besides, making well-qualified engineers, &c., training men in accordance with the original intent of the act for industrial purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate is proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. Well, Mr. President, it is utterly impossible to discuss this bill in five minutes. I do not propose to take anything like an hour or even half an hour, but five minutes is quite too short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is an objection to the bill it will take it over.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will not make objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut may proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall be, as I think I always have been, as condensed as possible.

Mr. INGALLS. If that consent is also to be extended to those who desire to speak upon the bill besides the Senator from Connecticut I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to preserve the rule the occupant of the chair, as Senator from Ohio, will object to the consideration of this bill as being too important to be considered within the limitation of five minutes' debate.

Mr. CHACE. I think we can get through with the bill under the five-minute rule, and I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER. I do not care to raise the point of order, but I want a decision on this question. When the Senate gives unanimous consent to the consideration of a bill, no Senator objecting to it, and the bill is taken up and read through and we spend half an hour or an hour upon it, and amendments are moved and carried, I hold that then it is not in the power of any Senator to object to that bill. It must go on under the rule, subject to a five minutes' debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that in this case we have not reached that point.

Mr. MILLER. That point was reached in the consideration of this bill yesterday. Unanimous consent was asked for its consideration; it was given; the bill was taken up; it was read through; half a dozen amendments were made to it, and then the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] objected to its further consideration, and the President of the Senate laid it aside. I held that that was wrong then, and I believe it is wrong now. If we can do that, we can go on and waste all our time; any Senator can allow a question to be discussed here for two hours together, under unanimous consent, and then get up and say, "I object to its consideration," and that ends the whole matter. If so, I do not want any more unanimous consents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York rise to a question of order that the objection comes too late under the rule under which we are operating? Under Rule VIII to which this is supplementary "objection may be interposed at any stage in the proceedings" before final passage.

Mr. CHACE. But I desire to call attention to the fact that we are proceeding now under a special assignment made by unanimous agreement yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special rule also provides that objection being made a case shall be passed over.

Mr. CHACE. Not if we made a special assignment of this day for this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the object and meaning of this resolution was to enable an objection to be made at any time in the progress of a case, so that time should not be wasted.

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand that we are proceeding under the eighth rule at all. We are proceeding under a special order of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Chair, who has interposed this objection, to withdraw it a moment, in order that I may complete the amendment I offered last before the bill is considered again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the consent of the Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to complete this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withdraw the objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I propose in line 6 of section 6, after the word "State," to insert the words:

And to each Territory entitled under the provisions of section 9 of this act.

So as to refer to the section which has been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it in order to move to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order, by the express terms of the special order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is renewed.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to know under what rule we are acting. I do not understand that we are acting under the regular rules of the Senate, but under a special agreement made in the Senate openly to which everybody gave his assent. Therefore this bill is proceeding under unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the order read. The Chair only desires to carry out the wishes of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the following order, adopted on the 7th instant:

Ordered, That for the next six days of the legislative sittings of the Senate, after the call for and disposition of resolutions shall have been passed, the time remaining until half past 12 o'clock shall be devoted to the Calendar, beginning with the first case thereon, and every matter objected to shall be passed by, and debate shall be limited to five minutes for any Senator on the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Even in the absence of the eighth rule the Chair would hold under this language that an objection might be made at any time while a bill was under consideration; but taken in connection with the eighth rule, of which this is an amendment, that rule expressly provides that an objection may be made at any stage.

Mr. MILLER. The special rule adopted makes no mention whatever of the eighth rule, and we are not proceeding under the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will allow the Chair to finish.

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under this modified order there is an express withdrawal of the right given by the eighth rule, that pending the consideration of business under this special rule no motion shall be made to take it out of the operation of the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. It was so distinctly announced when the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GEORGE. What became of the unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, like any other case, was taken up and until objection was made it was considered. It was passed over informally as a matter of convenience to enable Senators to prepare amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I be allowed to recall to the Chair's memory the fact that some little argument arose about it yesterday, and unanimous consent was asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that the bill be taken up again to-day, retaining its place, and unanimous consent was given to take it up to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same was done with four other cases which had been proceeded with without objection and acted upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Regular order.

Mr. MILLER. I simply desire to say that I have had no understanding that there was any such rule in operation at the present time when unanimous consent was given and a bill had been considered for half an hour or more, that it was then in the power of any Senator to rise in his place and stop the further consideration of the bill by an objection. This bill is one in which a majority of the American people are interested, and I do not think that any technical rule in this body should throw it out at this stage of the proceedings. It has been allowed to go over repeatedly in order that Senators might have time to study it and be prepared to consider the question. Yesterday it went over again on a request that certain Senators might give it further examination. Now to throw it out upon a technical objection of this kind in my judgment would be doing a very great injustice to the class of people who are interested.

Mr. HARRIS. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MILLER. I asked the Chair a moment ago under what rule it was that a Senator had a right to object to a bill which had been taken up by unanimous consent after that unanimous consent had been granted. I have not yet been referred to the rule nor heard it read.

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair has made his decision, and if there is no appeal I shall object to any further debate on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York take an appeal from the decision of the Chair? The Chair, however, ought to say to the Senate that under the operation of the special order under which the Senate is now acting, without any other rule, he would regard as clear the right to make an objection at any time.

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand that there is any such rule as that except the eighth rule, and we are not now acting under the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I make a suggestion in the interest of peace in this matter? I do not wish to be held responsible for any debate, and I will agree at any time to make a motion to take up the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CHACE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question which I suppose is privileged, and I should like to have it set right now before going any further.

I was absent from the Senate, in the service of the Senate however, a few minutes ago when the agricultural experiment station bill came up. I find laid on the table the print of an amendment printed as intended to be proposed by me. I think it must be a misprint for the name of some other Senator. I have not offered any amendment to the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. In one moment more when I was cut off by the five-minute rule I should have stated that I had offered an amendment and by accident it was misprinted as offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it must be a mistake. No doubt it is an excellent amendment.

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

The bill (S. 1262) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been read in full and was under consideration at the arrival of half past 12 o'clock yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, will be passed over.

ABEL J. LEWIS.

The bill (H. R. 6381) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

GEORGE S. FISHER.

The bill (S. 1834) for the relief of George S. Fisher was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

HEIRS OF ERSKINE S. ALLIN.

The bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

THOMAS G. CORBIN.

Mr. CAMERON. During my absence temporarily a moment ago the bill (S. 1262) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin was passed over. I hope that the Senator who made the objection will withdraw it. The bill has passed the Senate twice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not now. I do not want the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] to have all the objections to himself.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA LANDS.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to make a motion to call back a bill from the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to submit a motion at this time.

Mr. DAWES. I desire that the House bill No. 7087 which passed this body a fortnight ago may be recalled to the Senate. I should like to have the proper motion entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill named by him be recalled from the House of Representatives. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. DAWES. A bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas. The purpose of calling it back is to get a committee of conference on the amendments of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order recalling the bill will be made.

JOHN WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. 2266) for the relief of John Williams was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator reporting that bill [Mr. PIKE] is not present.

Mr. CAMERON. The report is here.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a very doubtful question in my mind as to the liability of the United States. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over under the rule.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-railway Company, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS.

The bill (S. 2297) concerning Federal elections was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

HEIRS OF ERSKINE S. ALLIN.

Mr. PLATT. When my attention was withdrawn for a moment, Order of Business 967, being the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, was called, and I understand the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] objected. I think he was under a misapprehension.

Mr. CHACE. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection being withdrawn——

Mr. MCMILLAN. Objections were made to preceding cases, so that they had better all go together.

Mr. CHACE. I withdraw them all.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. Is this bill to extend a patent?

Mr. PLATT. No, sir. I will state what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $30,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid in equal parts to Fannie T. Allin, of Springfield, Mass., and Augusta M. Ladd, of Holyoke Mass., respectively widow and daughter of the late Erskine S. Allin; the said Allin being the inventor of the Springfield breech-loading rifle-musket, for which neither he nor his heirs have received any compensation.

Mr. COCKRELL. This involves a very serious question. Here is a bill proposing to grant $100,000 for the patents of a gentleman who was in the service of the Government for thirty or forty years, receiving annual pay and a salary during all the time that these alleged inventions were made. I do not believe it is either fair or just or right that such enormous sums of money should be paid under such circumstances. I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. PLATT. If I may be indulged I wish to say that I feel a great interest in this bill, and I will endeavor some time before the close of the session to get it up and have it discussed.

Mr. COCKRELL. When we can discuss it outside of the five-minute rule.

ABEL J. LEWIS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his objection to Order of Business 908, being House bill 6381.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his objection?

Mr. CHACE. Yes, sir.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6381) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a case in regard to which some one, I do not know who, said to me that it was likely to be allowed at the Pension Office, and I suggested to the Chief Clerk that when it came up it might be allowed to remain upon the Calendar and not be acted upon. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

OBSTRUCTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The bill (S. 64) to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters and to protect public works against trespass or injury was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the rule.

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

The bill (S. 474) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. CAMERON. Why object? There is a good report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Regular order.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. MILLER. It is withdrawn to hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The report will be read.

The Secretary began to read the report, submitted by Mr. Jackson, from the Committee on Claims, March 11, 1886.

Mr. SPOONER. That report is very long, and I think I can state the substance of it if the Senator from New York will withdraw his demand that it be read at length.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will make a satisfactory statement, of course I will withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

Mr. SPOONER. This bill is to refund to the parties named in it taxes assessed upon spirits in bond in 1869 in excess of what was clearly right. The report is a very elaborate one, drawn by Mr. Jackson and submitted by him from the Committee on Claims, and I know that fact will commend it to the favorable consideration of the Senate. It embodies also a decision of the present presiding officer of the Senate, while Secretary of the Treasury, in favor of a claim identical with this, and also an opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in favor of this claim, but the Attorney-General decided upon technical grounds that it could not be paid except upon additional legislation.

The facts out of which these claims grow are simply these, in brief: Prior to the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, and under the act of 1866, large quantities of distilled spirits were stored by distillers in United States bonded warehouses, and parties were in the habit of buying and selling spirits in bond. It had been the uniform custom of the Government to levy its assessment and to collect its tax not upon the spirits as registered upon their deposit in the bonded warehouse, but upon a regauge at the time they were withdrawn, thus not taxing the spirits lost in bond by leakage. That custom had been unbroken, and it entered of course into the minds of the parties in fixing prices upon sale of bonded spirits.

These people had bought with the expectation, and a reasonable expectation it was, that they would only be taxed as had been the custom, this allowance being made for leakage. The circular under which that allowance was made was revoked suddenly, and they were taxed as no other purchasers had been taxed, for the leakage. This bill is a proposition to refund to them the excessive tax which they paid. It is treating them by the Government as all others were treated. The same bill was favorably reported by Mr. CARLISLE, from the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, and it has been several times favorably reported in both Houses.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make a single inquiry in regard to the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin. Does the Senator suppose that this pays all the persons who would be entitled to such a ruling, or are others to follow?

Mr. SPOONER. I understand, though I am not sure of that, that this covers all claimants similarly situated, certainly all that are known; and if it does not, if the claims are just, that fact would be no just reason for rejecting this bill.

Mr. PLATT. It would be a reason perhaps why we ought to give it a little more careful consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

REAR-ADMIRAL CARTER.

The bill (S. 729) for the relief of Rear-Admiral Carter was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and will be passed over.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 709) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Let that go over. The rule was yesterday that where there was an adverse report the bill went over as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is not an adverse report.

Mr. DOLPH. I see there are minority views.

THEOPHILUS FISK MILLS.

The bill providing for the payment of $2,500 to Theophilus Fisk

Mills for executing a model and design for an equestrian statue of the late General John A. Rawlins was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of that bill. I see there is no report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Senator who reported the bill [Mr. VOORHEES] does not seem to be present.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the bill will be allowed to pass. I do not think there is any objection to it. It comes from the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PLATT. I think we ought to have an explanation of this bill. I do not intend to object to it, but if the Senator who reported it will make an explanation, I should like to hear it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think there are papers connected with this case which establish its justice. It has been made a matter of investigation for some years past before the House Committee and the Senate Committee on the Library. In the Congress before this a gentleman from New York who was a member of the House committee made an elaborate report upon it.

The facts were about these: When General Rawlins died, Mr. Mills, a son of Clark Mills, and a very respectable artist, was employed, it would seem, by the War Department and by persons close to General Rawlins to make a design for an equestrian statue with a view of making an equestrian statue of General Rawlins. I understand that after he had worked a year and more, perhaps two years, and finished a design for an equestrian statue, the Army of the Cumberland, or perhaps the Grand Army of the Republic—the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who is not now in his seat could tell better if he was here than I—took up the subject of a statue to General Rawlins and erected one west of the State Department and in not an eligible part of the city for a statue to anybody, much less to a distinguished soldier like General Rawlins.

The work by Mr. Mills was necessarily abandoned and his design was left uncompleted; but the committee every time it touched the subject came to the conclusion that there were equities belonging to a man who had in good faith the right to believe that he was employed to do this work and went on doing it, and we thought as a settlement it would be well to grant him this amount, which is much less than he thought, and still thinks, is his due. We thought the Government could well afford to liquidate this matter at the amount fixed in this bill.

That is the history of the case as well as I can tell it until I shall get hold of the papers. I remember that there were no two opinions in the Joint Committee on the Library that something was due him, and the question was referred to a subcommittee to ascertain how much, and the results of the investigation made by that subcommittee are in this bill. I think it ought to pass in simple justice to a meritorious man.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The facts do not seem to be very definitely stated in reference to the authority under which this work is alleged to have been done. The Senator says that if he has an opportunity to examine the case more fully he can get the facts more exactly; and unless we can have a more definite statement of them I shall object to the present consideration of the bill. But if a more definite statement can be furnished by the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. VOORHEES. I am perfectly willing to let the bill go over until Monday or Tuesday next. In the mean time I will refresh myself upon the facts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that would be better.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill was called up once when the Senator from Indiana was not present, and it went over then at my suggestion for the purpose of obtaining information.

I introduced myself the resolution that passed through Congress appropriating money to erect a statue to General John A. Rawlins, and the statue that was selected and put up was the one that was voted for by Congress. This is a different one, as I understand, one that was not selected. What authority there was for it I do not know. I never heard of it until I saw this proposition.

Mr. VOORHEES. I alluded to the Senator from Illinois in my remarks a moment ago, saying that he was not present or he could state a certain point in the matter better than I could. That was as to the execution of the statue that now stands.

Mr. LOGAN. The statue that now stands was selected by a committee and paid for by an appropriation from Congress; but this one I know nothing about. I never heard of it until the proposition was made here to pay for it.

Mr. VOORHEES. The history of it, I will state to the Senator from Illinois, comes back to me a little more clearly. Upon the death of General Rawlins, as I said—and I state this now, not asking action on the bill—Mr. Mills was employed to take a cast of his face with a view to a statue, which was to be equestrian; and I think he was employed by General Meigs. He was employed by what seemed to him, and what would seem to anybody else under the circumstances, to have been high and competent authority, under which he went to work and did a great deal of work, much more than he and his friends allege this would pay for, but after a while that work was superseded by the one to which the Senator from Illinois alludes.

I am willing that this matter shall go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before it goes over I ask leave to say a single word, as I have just come in. This matter, if it is to pay for taking a cast, was examined in the Committee on the Library several years ago when I had the honor to be a member of it, and my recollection is that the committee at that time were all of opinion, having heard the whole story, that this gentleman was not entitled to anything more than he had received, on the merits of the whole case.

Mr. VOORHEES. He never received anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He received something for something else.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will look into it and see what there is about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 100 was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. PLUMB. The Secretary informs me that Senate bill 100 has been sent to the House of Representatives. I move that the House be requested to return the bill.

Mr. MILLER. What is the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. The bill giving Mr. Crook extra pay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection a message will be sent to the House of Representatives requesting the return of the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. CONGER. What was the action in regard to that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Kansas was that the bill be recalled from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONGER. Why?

Mr. PLUMB. I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and I wish to have the bill returned so that the motion to reconsider may be properly considered in connection with the bill itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider was entered in time, and this is the ordinary formal motion to recall a bill under those circumstances.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Senator wish to take up the motion to reconsider now?

Mr. PLUMB. I will take it up at any time when the bill is here. I shall be glad to enter into the discussion of it at any time, even to the exclusion of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed the Senator would take anything up sooner than that.

DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

The resolution submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK March 31, 1886, that the commissioners of the District of Columbia inform the Senate whether they are stockholders in certain corporations, &c., was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

B. B. CONNOR.

The bill (S. 1537) for the relief of B. B. Connor, of Louisville, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 2079) to provide for the control of the reservation of public lands and the distribution of hot water, Hot Springs, Ark., was announced as next in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall have to object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

COLLISION SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 4) to permit the owners of certain vessels and the owners or underwriters of cargoes laden thereon to sue the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. MCMILLAN. I see the time set apart for the consideration of the Calendar has expired, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are thirty seconds yet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The river and harbor bill will come up necessarily in half a minute.

Mr. EVARTS. I hope this bill may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length. The hour has not yet arrived.

The bill was read.

Mr. EVARTS. I hope this bill may be considered to-morrow, as the time has now arrived for other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive any motion in regard to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the bill would come up as unfinished business to-morrow. This is now the end of the morning hour.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The river and harbor bill is now up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It being up, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Having charge of the appropriation bill for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, I desire to make a few remarks in reference to the continuance of the consideration of the bill at this time.

The Senate entered upon the consideration of the river and harbor bill on Friday last, a week ago to-day. A request for the formal reading of the bill upon its first reading occupied a portion of Friday and Saturday. The intervention of the holiday, the Fourth of July, prevented us from considering the bill on Monday. On the subsequent days of this week we have considered the bill as rapidly as I could succeed in securing the action of the Senate on the amendments of the committee. I supposed we should be able to finish the bill to-day; but it seems to be understood by the Senate that to-day was set apart for the consideration of some other business in executive session which has been pending for some time and is believed to be of great importance.

Under the circumstances, having conferred with those in favor of the consideration of the river and harbor bill, I have deemed it advisable not to interpose any objection to this motion or to ask the Senate to refuse to go into executive session to-day; but I desire to ask the Senate to finish this bill to-morrow. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote upon the river and harbor bill be taken to-morrow evening at 5 o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The river and harbor bill will come up as the regular business to-morrow if the rest of this day be devoted to executive business.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As I can not obtain the consent of the Senate to my proposition, I shall have to yield to the necessities of the case and proceed as best I can to-morrow. I shall ask the Senate to sit beyond the usual hour to-morrow for the purpose of disposing of the bill, if it is not finished before we arrive at that hour.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the following bills:

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook; and

A bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the resolution of the House providing for the printing of the report of the international polar expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 810) granting a pension to Charles J. Esty;

An act (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie;

An act (S. 1217) for the relief of Henry Bellion;

An act (S. 1390) for the relief of B. Frank Patterson;

An act (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis;

An act (S. 2067) to increase the pension of Zebulon S. Tompkins; and

An act (S. 2152) to amend chapter 218 of the acts of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, approved June 15, 1882.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for your information a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing the correspondence which has been exchanged between the Department of State and the Governments of Switzerland and Italy on the subject of international copyright.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 9, 1886.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 10, 1886, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 9th day of July, 1886.

George W. Bishop, of Maryland, to be assistant treasurer of the United States at Baltimore, Md., to succeed Francis M. Darby, whose term of office will expire by limitation July 11, 1886.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 9, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on the day before yesterday the pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] to refer the President's message and accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and upon that motion had demanded the previous question. On ordering the previous question the yeas and nays were ordered, the roll was called, and no quorum appeared. The question now is upon the demand for the previous question, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I was in hopes that some arrangement might be made—but I do not see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] in his seat—an arrangement by which the call of the roll may be avoided. My impression is that upon this side there are two or three cases of which gentlemen have personal knowledge and upon which they desire to make brief observations. The remainder, then, of the cases can be referred without debate by the House. The pending bill the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] desires to be heard upon for ten or fifteen minutes, hoping that upon a statement so made the House would refuse to refer the case.

Mr. TAULBEE. The chairman of the committee is in the committee-room. I have sent for him and think it is possible that some amicable arrangement can be arrived at. I ask, therefore, that the call of the roll be deferred for a few moments.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order pending this delay to ask unanimous consent to present a House bill with Senate amendments and ask on behalf of the committee non-concurrence in the Senate amendments at this time?

The SPEAKER. Although the Chair is excecuting the rule of the House, if there be no objection, while waiting to see if some arrangement can not be arrived at, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, the Chair will entertain the request of the gentleman from Kansas and submit it to the House.

Mr. PERKINS. This is a bill which has passed both the House and the Senate and comes back to the House with a Senate amendment. It is the desire of the committee to move non-concurrence in the Senate amendment and ask a committee of conference.

This is the bill with reference to the settlement of the Otoe and Missouria Indian reservations in Kansas and Nebraska. The House bill extended the time of payment on the part of these settlers five years. The Senate amendment reduces that to two years. That is the only difference between the two Houses, and to perfect the legislation I would like to ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the gentleman's request. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS. I see the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions now in his seat. I was stating, if I can have the gentleman's attention for a moment, that it is my understanding in relation to these veto messages touching pension bills, that there are but two or three cases upon which gentlemen on this side desire to be heard.

General GROSVENOR desires to be heard for ten or fifteen minutes on the pending bill, and then I understand that there are two or three others, beyond that, upon which some discussion is desired; and all the remainder of the bills can be referred to the committee by a direct vote of the House without debate so far as any opposition on this side is concerned.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, so far as determining the question as to whether or not the bills and messages of the President shall be referred, I think there will be no difficulty about arriving at an agreement. But if the proposition of the gentleman is to determine the merits of the cases, and have a vote upon one case which shall be taken as determining the merits of another, I should object, for to that I can not agree. Each case should stand upon its individual merits.

I understand the gentleman, whether correctly or not, that this debate and the votes to be taken are to be in relation to the question of reference only. To that I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Simply on the question of reference. For instance, as to the case pending the gentleman from Ohio can have fifteen minutes to make a statement and the vote can then be taken upon the question of reference. Then there are two or three other cases beyond that upon which we desire brief discussion as to the question of reference, and the rest of the bills can be referred without opposition.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What time does the gentleman suggest as the proper time for discussion? We ought to have a distinct understanding.

Mr. MATSON. Upon that subject I desire to say I think there will be no difficulty in making some reasonable agreement as to the proposition to refer and the amount of time to be devoted to the debate. I want, however, to say to the House that under a previous order of the House the case of Carter W. Tiller was set for to-day, and I wish to know if it is to take precedence over the business now here?

The SPEAKER. It can not; because the Chair is executing a rule of the House, which requires him immediately after the reading of the journal to lay before the House all messages received the day before. The order of the House is not yet executed.

Mr. MATSON. Then the Tiller case can be called up——

The SPEAKER. After these cases are disposed of.

Mr. BURROWS. I make the suggestion that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be allowed fifteen minutes to make a statement of the facts in the case.

Mr. MATSON. I am willing he should take ten minutes to discuss the question of reference. Then if you signify what other cases there are which gentlemen desire to discuss on the question of reference, I am willing to agree to ten minutes of debate in each of those cases. I understand there are only two or three of them.

Mr. BURROWS. I suggest that in order to avoid the roll-call at this time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] be allowed to make a statement in this case for fifteen minutes before the question is taken on the reference.

Mr. MATSON. Then it is understood that the demand for the yeas and nays is to be withdrawn by unanimous consent and the gentleman from Ohio is to proceed for fifteen minutes, and then the vote is to be taken on the question of reference?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly; on the reference of that case.

Mr. MATSON. Without further delay?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will there be no opportunity to make a counter statement after the gentleman from Ohio shall have been heard?

Mr. BRUMM. You can take all the time you please on your side.

Mr. MATSON. Of course it is understood, if it is desired to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that will be allowed?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the order for the yeas and nays is vacated, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is entitled to fifteen minutes.

Mr. MCKINLEY. This agreement I understand applies only to the one case?

The SPEAKER. There is only one case now before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the right to reply is reserved to this side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the demand for the previous question is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. For the present it is, under an agreement, as the Chair understands, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] shall have fifteen minutes, and if any gentleman on the other side desires to make a response he shall have the same time.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, before we enter upon this let us know what is to be the arrangement. Is the same thing to be repeated on the next case that comes up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the agreement so far as he understands it. The order of the House directing the yeas and nays to be taken will be vacated, and the gentleman from Ohio has fifteen minutes in which to make a statement in regard to this case; and if any gentleman desires on the other side to respond he also has fifteen minutes, and then a vote is to be taken on the question of reference to the committee.

Mr. MORRISON. What as to the other cases?

The SPEAKER. No other case is before the House.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think there will be no trouble about them; there are only two or three cases on which the question will be raised.

Mr. MORRISON. If this thing is to be repeated in each case, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois states he objects to the arrangement.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not object if it is understood the other references are to be made without fifteen minutes of debate in each case.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no understanding about the rest of these cases. I made the suggestion I did in order to expedite business, and that arrangement will dispose of this case. I understand there are two or three others on which the question will be raised.

Mr. MORRISON. How many?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know precisely and I can not speak as to those. I can only speak as to this case.

Mr. MCKINLEY. You make no agreement as to subsequent cases.

Mr. BURROWS. My understanding is that the great majority of them will be referred without any question.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well; let it go.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I take it the question whether or not the message of the Executive should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions turns very much on the question which was originally involved in the application of Mrs. Bradley for a pension; and so, Mr. Speaker, I can not conceive of an argument against a reference of this bill that does not consider the merits of the bill itself.

In the limited time which I have to address the House I desire to go directly at that question, and not with words of crimination or condemnation against the President of the United States for the action which he has seen fit to take in this case; that is to say, I desire to stand upon better and stronger ground than an assault upon the motives of the Executive in this veto. I think the veto of the President has been caused by a total misapprehension of his relation to the administration of the Government of this country. I have read with a great deal of care all the vetoes that have emanated from this prolific source of vetoes, and I think the trouble lies in the fact that the President of the United States understands it to be his duty to examine carefully every act of Congress; and, if he himself as a member of Congress would not vote for the bill, he gives no sort of weight or character or consideration to the fact that both branches of the legislative department of the Government have acted affirmatively on the measure, and so putting up his own opinion against that of Congress vetoes the bill.

We sometimes hear something said about consolidation of power and centralization of government. I know of no such exhibition heretofore of a bad tendency toward consolidation as the spectacle of the President of the United States refusing to permit Congress to pension the starving soldiers of the Union. In other words, he adopts and carries into force the idea that in this country of ours the Executive of the Government has the right and duty to decide absolutely upon every question of legislation. In that respect I think he is wrong; but here and now I do not intend to follow out the discussion of that idea.

The next feature which I notice is an assumption which seems to have been lodged in the mind of the Executive that no private pension bill ought to be approved by him unless the applicant is entitled by law to a pension; for constantly all along the line of his vetoes he has taken occasion to say that there is no law authorizing such a pension as is proposed to be given in the bill submitted to him. He appears wholly oblivious to the fact that Congress is the law-making power, and has the right to confer a pension upon anybody.

There was no prior law authorizing the granting of a pension of $5,000 a year to Mrs. Grant; yet the Executive saw fit to approve the bill granting that pension. There was no law authorizing a pension of $2,000 a year to the widow of General Hancock; yet the President approved that bill—why? Because the legislative department of the Government, acting within the scope of its jurisdiction and doing an act which the Constitution conferred upon it the power to do, passed the bill, thereby submitting to the Executive the question whether he would approve that act. He did approve it. Yet he now comes to us and all along the line of these little pensions, these destitute widows' pensions, these poor men's pensions, he stands behind a proposition which has no merit in it and is not justified by any construction of the Constitution or the practices of the Government. What sentiment, think you, operated to produce these results?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to consider briefly the present case; and I undertake to say that if there was ever a case in which Congress ought to grant a pension by special act this is one. It is a case which could not be covered by a general law.

I call the attention of gentlemen, upon whichever side of the House they may be, to the fact that you can make no general law which will cover such cases as this. I agree that the presence in Congress of this vast number of private bills indicates that our general legislation upon the subject of pensions is totally defective, as I had occasion to say in the early part of the session; and I might, if it were profitable, go out of my way and say that there has not been manifested that zeal there should have been upon the part of Congress to correct these manifest defects. The presence of these private bills grows out of the fact that the general legislation of Congress on this subject has by lapse of time become worn out and imperfect, and ought necessarily to be amended and improved.

But there could not be any general law which would cover the case of Sarah Ann Bradley; and therefore there never can be a case in which Congress could more appropriately act than in this. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I undertake to say that when you have examined this case there are not many men of this House who will be willing to uphold the veto of the President; there are not many men here who will be willing to put themselves on record as refusing this woman a pension, in the light of the record which you have made upon other claims for pension which have been acted upon favorably in this House.

Thomas J. Bradley entered the Army in the spring of 1861 as a member of the Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers. He served until the close of 1864, having been meanwhile transferred by a consolidation to the Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, which I had the honor to command, and then serving out a total enlistment of over four years. He received at the battle of Nashville, as I recollect, a wound which was at the time dangerous, but not permanently so. He went home. He suffered more or less from that wound through the whole of his life, which terminated in the fall of 1882.

The physicians say that the termination of his life was to a certain extent—hard to be defined—attributable to the wound which he had received nearly twenty years before. He had received a pension for that wound, thus being put in the position of having established a claim. His pension was of trifling amount, I do not remember how much. It is not pretended that the injury was permanently a serious one; but the Government gave him a pension of, I think, at first $2 a month, and afterward possibly $4, I can not state accurately.

He had four sons, gallant young men. They all entered the Army in 1861. Two of them were shot dead upon the battlefield. Another came home with an arm shot off, and the fourth with an eye shot out, both of these sons being totally disabled from earning a living. They had no property; and Mrs. Bradley to-day, having passed the age of seventy, and being without a dollar, comes to Congress and asks that she may be put upon the pension-roll to receive the pittance of a widow's pension. And the President of the United States takes his coat off, gets behind a big desk, and, calling to his aid the Pension Department of the Government, as I am ready to show by the records of that office now in my hand, approves and incorporates into his message the substance of a veto furnished him by the department that probably rejected the claim of Sarah A. Bradley for want of strict legal authority to give her a pension under the general law. On the same day that he vetoed this bill, with the very same pen, he approved a bill which put Fitz-John Porter on the pension-list of the Government at nearly $3,500 a year, while Sarah A. Bradley, the mother of four sons, gallant, patriotic sons, two of whom died upon the battlefield, whose souls went up to God from the smoke of battle, and their lives went out in the clash of arms and the roar of deadly strife, and two more of whom are to-day dependent upon the charity of the country, helplessly disabled by the war, go to the poor-house. And this is the Government which undertakes to say that it is generous and liberal to its soldiers. This is the system that we hear called liberal and generous. This is the system of rewards to the private soldier. This is the way this Democratic House discharges its duty toward Fitz-John Porter and poor old starving Sally Ann Bradley, the mother of four gallant soldiers, two of whom are on the other side, and two are lingering here crippled.

I have not drawn a fancy sketch. I refer to the unanimous report of the Committeee on Invalid Pensions of this House, and I want some gentleman who will vote to uphold this veto of the President to tell me what new light he has got upon this case. What more do you know about Sally Ann Bradley than you did when you made a unanimous report in favor of granting her the allowance of this miserable litttle pension? Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I again ask, Mr. Speaker, that some reason shall be given why this claim should not be allowed, or why this bill should be again referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, there is no answer to my question. There is no answer to that proposition. This act is within the scope of the jurisdiction and the power of Congress. Both branches of Congress have acted upon this case, acted upon it intelligently and judicially, and no man stands up here to say that there is any reason why this woman should not have this pension, that there is any reason why this Congress should be overruled by the one-man power, that there is any reason why this woman should be sent to the poor-house while affluent men are pensioned on a generous scale by this Government. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, let me again place the facts before the House, for it seems we are now to vote upon this question. I do not know of any technical reason why this reference should be had. I know of no reason, unless some gentleman will stand up here and say that he desires to ascertain, beyond and outside the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, whether that report tells the truth or not, and if any one does say that, I want him to tell the House whether that committee has made a unanimous report in this case without knowing the facts. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The facts are that this woman was the wife of Thomas J. Bradley, who served nearly four years in the Union Army as a private soldier. He received a wound which substantially disabled him from duty; he received a small pension from the Government; he died, ultimately, in part from the effect of that wound. He took with him into the Army four able-bodied sons, who served as enlisted men. Two of them were shot dead in battle; the other two were disfigured and maimed for life and put in such a condition that they could not contribute to the support of their mother. That mother is now indigent.

The alternative is whether she shall receive this small pension from the Government or shall go to the poor-house, and the American Congress halts, terrified, paralyzed by the veto of a single man, who puts it upon a ground not justified by the Constitution, never heard of before in the history of the Government, a proposition tyrannical, a proposition in the direction of absolute usurpation, a proposition in the direction of displacing from its normal position the Congress of the United States, and turning over the administration and dispensation of the generosity of this Government to one man, and that, too, a man who on the same day he vetoed this bill could sign a proposition to place upon the pension-rolls of the United States, at the rate of nearly $3,500 a year, Fitz-John Porter. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I will simply say to him that if this bill is referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions that committee will again say whether or not they think this woman ought to be pensioned. I will add, further, that I have just learned that in the Forty-seventh Congress a Republican Senate said that this same woman ought not to be pensioned, for the very same reason that the President of the United States now says she ought not to be pensioned. I call for a vote.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. At the time the Senate took that action was not the husband of this woman living?

Mr. MATSON. Whether he was living or not, she is the same woman.

Mr. LONG. But was not the husband living at that time and receiving a pension?

Mr. MATSON. I do not know whether he was or not. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to refer this message and the accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood that the yeas and nays were not to be asked.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I think it was the understanding that the yeas and nays were not to be demanded.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood gentlemen to say that there would be no call for the yeas and nays. The proposition was to save time by allowing brief debate instead of having the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRUMM. The proposition was simply that the call for the yeas and nays should be withdrawn on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood that the reason given for the proposition was to prevent the consumption of time. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] said that, instead of taking time by calling the yeas and nays, if fifteen minutes were allowed for debate gentlemen on that side would be satisfied; but if gentlemen do not care to keep the understanding let them go on.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not understand that there was any agreement that the yeas and nays should not be called on the question of referring this bill and the veto message, and if I had known of any such proposition I would not have agreed to it, because I want the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would ask the Chair to state what the agreement was.

Mr. HILL. I renew the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope there will be no misunderstanding in reference to what was agreed upon; and am perfectly willing to submit the matter to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell of course what might have been the understanding among gentlemen upon the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But the public understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the order demanding the yeas and nays upon the previous question was rescinded by unanimous consent, it being understood that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROS-

VENOR] should have fifteen minutes to address the House, and if any gentleman on the other side demanded fifteen minutes to respond he should have that right, and that then a vote should be taken. But how that vote was to be taken, whether by the yeas and nays or otherwise, the Chair did not understand, nor was it stated.

Mr. BURROWS. After the statement of the gentleman from Ohio as to the merits of this case, we certainly want the yeas and nays on the question of reference.

Mr. HILL. Let them have it.

Mr. MATSON. We have no objection.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 122, nays 111, not voting 89; as follows:

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 3640, entitled "An act granting a pension to James T. Irwin."

This claimant enlisted in February, 1864, and was mustered out June 10, 1865. He is reported as absent sick from August 20, 1864, until mustered out. He seems to have been treated for remittent fever, chronic diarrhea, general debility, and palpitation of the heart.

In 1876 he filed a declaration for pension, alleging that at Petersburg, July 1, 1864, he contracted fever and inflammation of the eyes.

He filed an affidavit in January, 1877, in which he states that his diseased eyes resulted from diseased nerves, caused by a wound received June 18, 1864, at Petersburg, and from a consequent abscess on the back of the neck.

In an affidavit filed in July, 1878, he states that in June, 1864, in front of Petersburg he had his gun smashed in front of his face and his eyes injured, and afterwards he had an abscess on the back of his neck, typhoid fever, and disease of the left lung.

His claim founded upon these various allegations of injury was rejected in February, 1879.

In September, 1884, a declaration was filed for a pension, alleging disease of the heart contracted at Petersburg June 16, 1864.

The claimant was examined once in 1882 and twice in 1884 by United States examining surgeons and boards, and it is stated that these examinations failed to reveal any disease or disability except disease of the eyes and an irritable heart, the result of indigestion.

An oculist who made an examination in 1884 reported that the unnatural condition of claimant's eyes was congenital and in no manner the result of injury or disease.

Upon a consideration of the very short time that the claimant was in actual service, the different claims he has made touching his alleged disability, and the positive results of medical examinations, I am satisfied this pension should not be allowed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the message and accompanying bill were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FANNIE E. EVANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4126, entitled "An act granting a pension to Fannie E. Evans."

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of George S. Evans. He was a soldier in the Mexican war, and entered the Union Army in the war of the rebellion, on the 16th day of October, 1861, as major of a California regiment. He became a colonel in February, 1863, and resigned in April of that year, to take effect on the 31st of May ensuing. His resignation seems to have been tendered on account of private matters, and no mention was then made of any disability. It is stated in the committee's report to the House that in 1864 he accepted the office of adjutant-general of the State of California, which he held for nearly four years.

He died in 1883 from cerebral apoplexy.

In March, 1884, his widow filed an application for pension, based upon the allegation that from active and severe service in a battle with the Indians at Spanish Fort, in 1863, her husband incurred a hernia, which incapacitated him for active service.

There appears to be evidence to justify this statement, notwithstanding the fact that the deceased during the twenty years that followed before his death made no claim for such disability.

But it seems to me that the effort to attribute his death by apoplexy to the existence of hernia ought not to be successful.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move to refer the message and accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the message and accompanying bill were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had received with deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM H. COLE, late a representative from the State of Maryland, and concurred in the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the appointment of a joint committee to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to the place of burial, and that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. WILSON of Maryland, Mr. KENNA, and Mr. MANDERSON the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 199) providing for printing eulogies upon the late Michael Hahn.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook;

A bill (S. 581) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters of Clark's Fork of the Columbia River;

A bill (S. 701) for the relief of the legal representatives of Peter Lyle, deceased;

A bill (S. 702) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa;

A bill (S. 708) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith;

A bill (S. 725) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee;

A bill (S. 794) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz;

A bill (S. 882) to regulate the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy;

A bill (S. 1056) to accept and ratify an agreement made by the Pah-Ute Indians, and granting a right of way to the Carson and Colorado Railroad Company through the Walker River reservation, in Nevada;

A bill (S. 1211) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the confederated tribes and bands of Indians occupying the Yakama reservation, in the Territory of Washington, for the extinguishment of their title to so much of said reservation as is required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same;

A bill (S. 1310) for the relief of William Tabb; and

A bill (S. 1361) for the relief of Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DULUTH, MINN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 5550, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building at Duluth, Minn."

After quite a careful examination of the public needs at the point mentioned I am entirely satisfied that the public building provided for in this bill is not immediately necessary.

Not a little legislation has lately been perfected and very likely more will be necessary to increase miscalculated appropriations for, and correct blunders in, the construction of many of the public buildings now in process of erection.

While this does not furnish a good reason for disapproving the erection of other buildings where actually necessary, it induces close scrutiny, and gives rise to the earnest wish that new projects for public buildings shall for the present be limited to such as are required by the most pressing necessities of the Government's business.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARY KARSTETTER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 2043, entitled "An act to place Mary Karstetter on the pension-roll."

The husband of this beneficiary, Jacob Karstetter, was enrolled June 30, 1864, as a substitute in a Pennsylvania regiment, and was discharged for disability June 20, 1865, caused by a gunshot wound in the left hand.

A declaration for pension was filed by him in 1865, based upon this wound, and the same was granted, dating from June in that year, which he drew till the time of his death, August 21, 1874.

In 1882 his widow filed her application for pension, alleging that he died of wounds received in battle. The claim was made that he was injured while in the Army by a horse running over him.

There is little or no evidence of such an injury having been received; and if this was presented there would be no necessary connection between that and the cause of the soldier's death, which was certified by the attending physician to be gastritis and congestion of the kidneys.

I can hardly see how the Pension Bureau could arrive at any conclusion except that the death of the soldier was not due to his military service, and the acceptance of this finding, after an examination of the facts, leads me to disapprove this bill.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, to refer the message and bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions was then agreed to.

ROXANA B. ROWLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval House bill No. 5306 entitled "An act granting a pension to Roxana V. Rowley."

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of Franklin Rowley, who enlisted February 8, 1865, was promoted to first lieutenant March 13, 1865, and was discharged May 22, 1865, having tendered his resignation, as it is stated, on account of incompetency. His tender of resignation was indorsed by the commanding officer of his regiment, as follows: "This man is wholly unfit for an officer."

It will be seen that he was in the service a little more than three months.

In 1880, fifteen years after his discharge, he applied for a pension, alleging that he contracted disease of the liver while in the service.

Upon an examination of the claim, his attending physician, before enlistment, stated that as early as 1854 the claimant was afflicted with dyspepsia and functional disease of the liver; that he regarded him as incurable, so far as being restored to sound health was concerned, and that if he had been at home at the time when he enlisted he would have advised against it.

The testimony of this physician as to the claimant's condition after his discharge is referred to in the report of the committee of the House to whom this bill was referred, and I do not understand that he is at all impeached. He certainly is better informed than any other person regarding the condition of the man who was his patient.

The soldier died in 1881, sixteen years after his discharge, and his widow filed her claim for pension in 1882, alleging that the death of her husband was caused by a disease of the liver contracted in the service.

Her claim was rejected in 1883, upon the ground that the disease of which her husband died existed prior to his enlistment.

I can not avoid the conclusion, upon all the facts presented, that his death was not chargeable to any incident of his brief military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

ROBERT H. STAPLETON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4797, entitled "An act granting a pension to Robert H. Stapleton."

This claimant filed an application for pension in the Pension Bureau in 1883, alleging that, while acting as lieutenant-colonel of a New Mexico regiment, on February 21, 1862, the tongue of a caisson struck him, injuring his left side. A medical examination made in 1882 showed a fracture of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh ribs of the left side.

If these fractures were the result of the injury alleged they were immediately apparent, and the delay of twenty-one years in presenting the claim for pension certainly needs explanation.

Claims of this description, by a wise provision of law, must, to be valid, be prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

The rank which this claimant held presupposes such intelligence as admits of no excuse on the ground of ignorance of the law for his failure to present his application within the time fixed by law.

The evidence of disability from the cause alleged is weak, to say the most of it, and I can not think that such a wholesome provision of law as that above referred to, which limits the time for the adjustment of such claims, should be modified upon the facts presented in this case.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

MRS. MARGARET A. JACOBY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 5021, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Jacoby."

A pension has been allowed on account of the disability of the claimant's husband, dating from his discharge in 1864.

The beneficiary named in this bill applied for pension in 1885, alleging that she married the soldier in 1864; that he incurred deafness and chronic diarrhea while in the service, from the combined effect of which he partially lost his mind; that on the 7th day of September, 1875, he disappeared, and that after diligent search and inquiry she is unable to learn anything of him since that time.

His disability from Army service should be conceded and his death at some time and in some manner may well be presumed; but the fact that he died from any cause related to his disability or his service in the Army has no presumption and not a single particle of proof to rest upon.

With proper diligence something should be discovered to throw a little light upon this subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

MARIA CUNNINGHAM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 5414, entitled "An act granting a pension to Maria Cunningham."

The husband of the beneficiary named in this bill enlisted January 29, 1862, and was discharged January 20, 1865.

He applied for a pension in 1876, alleging a shell wound in the head. His claim was rejected on the ground that there appeared to be no disability from that cause. No other injury or disability was ever claimed by him, but at the time of his examination in 1876 he was found to be sickly, feeble, and emaciated, and suffering from an advanced stage of saccharine diabetes.

His widow filed an application for a pension in 1879, alleging that her husband died in December, 1877, of spinal disease and diabetes contracted in the service.

Her claim was rejected because evidence was not furnished that the cause of the soldier's death had its origin in the military service.

There seems to be an entire absence of proof of this important fact.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

ABNER MOREHEAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 3304, entitled "An act to restore the name of Abner Morehead to the pension-roll."

The person mentioned in this bill was pensioned in November, 1867, upon the claim made by him that, in 1863, from hardship and exposure incident to camp life and field duty, he contracted a fever which settled in his eyes, almost wholly destroying his sight. Afterward his pension was increased to $15 a month, dating from December, 1867, and arrears at the rate of $8 a month from February, 1864. In 1876 the case was put in the hands of a special agent of the Pension Bureau for examination, and upon his report showing that the claimant's disease of the eyes existed prior to enlistment, his name was dropped from the rolls.

An application for restoration was made in 1879, and a thorough examination was made by a special examiner in 1885, who reported that the testimony taken conclusively established the fact that the claimant had disease of the eyes prior to the time of enlistment, the result of a disorder which he specially mentions, and that he was treated for the same more than a year subsequently to 1860. He adds: "There is no merit whatever in this case, and it is evident that he obtained a large sum as pension to which he must have known he was not entitled."

The results of these examinations, instituted for the express purpose of developing the facts, and with nothing apparent to impeach them, should, I think, control as against the statements of neighbors and comrades, based upon mere general observation, and not necessarily covering the period which is important to the controversy.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the message and the accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was then agreed to.

WILLIAM DERMODY.

The SPEAKER also laid berore the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 1505, entitled "An act granting a pension to William Dermody."

By the records of the War Department which have been furnished me it appears that this claimant enlisted August 19, 1861; that he deserted August 29, 1862; in November and December, 1862, he is reported as present in confinement in regimental guard-house, to forfeit one month's pay by sentence of regimental court-martial; he is reported as having deserted again in December, 1863, but as present for duty in January and February, 1864. He re-enlisted in the latter month, and was mustered out July 17, 1865, and with his company was paid up to and including July 21, 1865.

He filed a declaration for pension in 1879, alleging that he received a gunshot wound in the thigh at Trenton, N. J., July 21, 1865, and that the wound was inflicted by a member of the Invalid Corps, who was whipping a drummer boy and the claimant interfered in behalf of the boy.

It is quite certain that the transaction took place July 23.

An examining board, in 1880, found pistol shot in thigh, but refused to give the claimant a rating, because, as they report, "from the evidence before the board there is reason to suppose that he was deserting from the barracks at Trenton, July 23, 1865, and was shot by the guard."

This may not be a just suspicion or finding, but he surely was not in the service nor in the performance of any military duty at the time of the injury, nor was he engaged in such manner as to entitle him to indemnification at the hands of the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the message and the accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion of Mr. MATSON was agreed to.

ELIZABETH M'KAY.

The Speaker also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4782, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elizabeth McKay."

The beneficiary named is the widow of Rowley S. McKay, who in 1862 seems to have been employed as pilot on the ram Switzerland. He seems to have been upon the rolls of two other vessels of the United States, the Covington and General Price, but was discharged by Admiral Porter in June, 1864, with loss of all pay and emoluments.

He filed an application for pension in 1870, alleging that while on duty as pilot and in action with the rebel ram Arkansas his hearing became affected by heavy firing. He also claimed that in February, 1863, while on the vessel Queen of the West, she grounded, and to escape capture he got off and floated down the river on a cotton bale, and being in the water about three hours the exposure caused a disease of the urinary organs; and that a few days after, while coming up the river on a transport, the boat was fired into and several balls passed through his left thigh. It seems that this claim was not definitely passed upon, but it is stated that the records failed to show that McKay was in the service of the United States at the time he alleged the contraction of disease of the urinary organs and was wounded in the thigh.

The beneficiary named in this bill never made application for pension to the Pension Bureau, but it appears that she bases her claims to consideration by Congress upon the allegation that in 1862, while her husband was acting as pilot of the ram or gunboat Switzerland, he contracted chronic diarrhea, from which he never recovered, and that he died from the effects of said disease in May, 1874.

It will be observed that among the various causes which the soldier or sailor himself alleged as the grounds of his application for pension chronic diarrhea is not mentioned.

There does not appear to be any medical testimony to support the claim thus made by the widow, and the cause of death is not definitely stated.

Taking all together, it has the appearance of a case by no means rare, where chronic diarrhea or rheumatism are appealed to as a basis for a pension claim in the absence of something more substantial and definite.

The fact that the claim of the beneficiary has never been presented to the Pension Bureau influences in some degree my action in withholding my approval of this bill.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that this message, with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that motion I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. MATSON was agreed to.

LEWIS W. SCANLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 3043, entitled "An act granting a pension to Lewis W. Scanland."

The claimant filed his declaration for a pension in 1884, alleging that he contracted chronic diarrhea while serving in a company of mounted Illinois volunteers in the Black Hawk war.

The records show that he served from April 18, 1832, to May 28, in the same year.

He was examined by a board of surgeons in 1884, when he was said to be seventy-five years old. In his examination he did not claim to have diarrhea for a good many years. On the contrary, he claimed to be affected with constipation, and said he had never had diarrhea of late years, except at times when he had taken medicine for constipation.

I am inclined to think it would have been a fortunate thing if in this case it could have been demonstrated that a man could thrive so well with the chronic diarrhea for fifty-two years, as its existence in the case of this good old gentleman would prove. We should then, perhaps, have less of it in claims for pension.

The fact is in this case there is no disability which can be traced to the forty days' military service of fifty-four years ago, and I think little if any more infirmity than is usually found in men of the age of the claimant.

Entertaining this belief, I am constrained to withhold my signature from this bill.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that this message, with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee on Pensions; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there is a little misunderstanding between the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and myself. Upon conversing with him I find he is under the impression that the agreement was there should be only fifteen minutes' debate on any bill which was antagonized on this side. I did not so understand the matter. I understood that fifteen minutes were allotted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], but we have rested upon the assumption that a gentleman taking the floor upon one of these measures would have an hour. I want to keep the agreement according to the intent with which it was made. If it be in accordance with the agreement we want more than fifteen minutes upon some of these bills. I think, however, there is perhaps only one bill which we desire to discuss.

Mr. MATSON. This bill did not come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is a bill which was reported by the Committee on Pensions. I have nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURROWS. I simply wanted to know from the Chair whether there was such an understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing about the private conversation between gentlemen.

Mr. BURROWS. Whatever arrangement was made was made publicly.

Mr. MATSON. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr.

BURROWS] that I understood distinctly there were not more than three cases on which discussion would be desired besides that on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] wished to speak, and that not more than fifteen minutes were desired on any one case.

Mr. BURROWS. What I said was that fifteen minutes were desired by the gentleman from Ohio. I defer to the judgment of the Chair whether there was any statement such as that just mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana. I did not so understand.

The SPEAKER. The only agreement of which the Chair knows anything was an agreement with reference to the message and bill then pending.

Mr. BURROWS. It now looks as if there were but one more case on which gentlemen on this side desire discussion. That is a case in charge of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]—a very important case; and he wants an hour on it.

Mr. MATSON. It will be time enough to settle that when we reach it.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE].

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. ELDREDGE to refer the message and accompanying bill to the Committee on Pensions was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. NEVIL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 3623, entitled "An act granting a pension to William H. Nevil."

This bill directs that the name of the claimant be placed upon the pension-roll "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

This very thing was done on the 22d day of June, 1865, and the claimant is in the receipt at the present time of the full amount of pension allowed by our pension laws as administered by the Pension Bureau.

I suppose the intention of the bill was to increase this pension; but it is not framed in such a way as to accomplish that object, or to benefit the claimant in any way whatever.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1866.

Mr. MATSON. I move to refer the bill and message in this case to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that motion I ask the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. MATSON was agreed to.

JAMES CARROLL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 4642, entitled "An act granting a pension to James Carroll."

The claimant alleges that he was wounded while in the service as a member of Company B, Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Volunteers, while securing recruits for the regiment at Watauga, N. C., January 25, 1865.

The records of the War Department develop the fact that the name of this man is not borne upon any roll of the company to which he claims to belong.

He stated in his application that he was sworn in by one George W. Perkins—who, it appears, was a private in said company—and that Perkins was with him at the time he was shot.

This is undoubtedly true, and that the claimant was injured by a gunshot is also probably true. He was not, however, at the time regularly in the United States service, but this objection might in some circumstances be regarded as technical. The difficulty is that the fact that he was creditably employed in a service of benefit to the country is not satisfactorily shown. He gives two accounts of the business in which he was engaged, and Mr. Perkins's explanation of the manner in which the two were occupied is somewhat different still.

Carroll's claim, presented to the Pension Bureau, was rejected upon the ground that there was no record of his service on file. But in his testimony he stated that Perkins was wounded on the same occasion as himself, and that he, Perkins, was then a pensioner on account thereof.

The records of the Pension Bureau show that Perkins was pensioned in 1873 on account of three wounds received at the time and place of Carroll's injury.

It also appears that his name was dropped from the rolls in 1877 on the ground that his wounds were not received in the line of duty.

After an investigation made at that time by a special examiner, he reported that Perkins and Carroll had collected a number of men together who made their headquarters at the home of Carroll's mother, and were engaged in plundering the neighborhood; and that, on account of their depredations, they were hunted down by home guards and shot at the time they stated.

If this report is accepted as reliable it should of course lead to the rejection of the claim for pension on the part of Mr. Carroll.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that this bill, with the accompanying message, be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS DEMING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 2971, entitled "An act granting a pension to Francis Deming."

This claimant entered the service in August, 1861, and was discharged September 15, 1865.

His hospital record shows that during his service he was treated for various temporary ailments, among which rheumatism is not included.

He filed an application for pension in September, 1884, alleging that in August, 1864, he contracted rheumatism, which had resulted in blindness.

On examination of his case in November, 1884, he stated that his eyesight began to fail in 1882.

There seems to be no testimony showing his condition from the time of his discharge to 1880, a period of fifteen years.

The claim that his present condition of blindness is the result of his Army service is not insisted upon as a reason for granting him relief as strongly as his sad and helpless condition. The committee of the House to which this bill was referred, after detailing his situation, close their report with these words: "He served well his country in its dire need; his necessities now appeal for relief."

We have here presented the case of a soldier who did his duty during his Army service, and who was discharged in 1865 without any record of having suffered with rheumatism and without any claim of disability arising from the same; he returned to his place as a citizen, and in peaceful pursuits, with chances certainly not impaired by the circumstance that he had served his country, he appears to have held his place in the race of life for fifteen years or more. Then, like many another, he was subjected to loss of sight, one of the saddest afflictions known to human life.

Thereupon, and after nineteen years had elapsed since his discharge from the Army, a pension is claimed for him, upon a very shadowy allegation of the incurrence of rheumatism while in the service, coupled with the startling proposition that this rheumatism resulted, just previous to his application, in blindness. Upon medical examination it appeared that his blindness was caused by amaurosis, which is generally accepted as an affection of the optic nerve.

I am satisfied that a fair examination of the facts in this case justifies the statement that the bill under consideration can rest only upon the grounds that aid should be furnished to this ex-soldier because he served in the Army, and because he a long time thereafter became blind, disabled, and dependent.

The question is whether we are prepared to adopt this principle and establish this precedent.

None of us are entitled to credit for extreme tenderness and consideration toward those who fought their country's battles; these are sentiments common to all good citizens; they lead to the most benevolent care on the part of the Government and deeds of charity and mercy in private life. The blatant and noisy self-assertion of those who, from motives that may well be suspected, declare themselves above all others friends of the soldier can not discredit nor belittle the calm, steady, and affectionate regard of a grateful nation.

An appropriation has just been passed setting apart $76,000,000 of the public money for distribution as pensions, under laws liberally constructed, with a view of meeting every meritorious case; more than a million of dollars was added to maintain the Pension Bureau, which is charged with the duty of a fair, just, and liberal apportionment of this fund.

Legislation has been at the present session of Congress perfected considerably increasing the rate of pension in certain cases. Appropriations have also been made of large sums for the support of national homes where sick, disabled, or needy soldiers are cared for; and within a few days a liberal sum has been appropriated for the enlargement and increased accommodation and convenience of these institutions.

All this is no more than should be done.

But with all this, and with the hundreds of special acts which have been passed, granting pensions in cases where, for my part, I am willing to confess that sympathy rather than judgment has often led to the discovery of a relation between injury or death and military service, I am constrained by a sense of public duty to interpose against establishing a principle and setting a precedent which must result in unregulated, partial, and unjust gifts of public money under the pretext of indemnifying those who suffered in their means of support as an incident of military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move to refer this bill and the accompanying message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. How many more of these messages are there?

The SPEAKER. There is one more.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. There is a desire on this side to debate the present message, and also the one which is to follow. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his motion for the present and allow us thirty minutes' debate on this question, and probably about the same time on the next, thus giving one hour's debate on this side to the two cases instead of to one case, as I intimated before.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I have been disposed to get along with this business as rapidly as possible so as to save the time of the House. The gentleman from Michigan came to me a while ago and submitted a proposition that on the last of these veto messages, which I believe is the one next to be reached, there should be an hour's debate on the other side of the House. I stated to him that I would try to get this side of the House to agree to that proposition. I have since had some consultation with the gentlemen on this side, and they are disposed to agree—and I hope the gentleman from Michigan will agree—that there shall be debate for three-quarters of an hour upon that side and half an hour's debate in reply on this side, making one hour and a quarter in all.

Mr. BURROWS. Will not the gentleman agree that there shall be in addition thirty minutes' debate on this bill?

Mr. MATSON. The whole object, I suppose, of gentlemen on both sides of the House is to get along with the public business. Gentlemen will remember that after referring these messages the question is to be taken whether those vetoed bills already reported back shall pass notwithstanding the veto. Then the deficiency bill is ready to be voted on; and, as I am informed by members of the Committee on Appropriations, it is important to dispose of that bill to-day. Besides, the Senate amendments to the legislative appropriation bill are to be considered. The 15th of the month is fast approaching; so that it is very important for us to consider these various matters if possible to-day.

I hope, therefore, gentlemen on the other side will agree to a debate of three-quarters of an hour on that side and half an hour on this.

Of course it is expected something will be said on that side of the House which will require an answer. That will take an hour and a quarter. So it will then be 2 o'clock before we can reach the consideration of bills that have been reported.

Mr. STEELE. Three-quarters, I think, is enough.

Mr. BURROWS. The proposition I made, instead of taking an hour's debate——

Mr. MATSON. I understand.

Mr. BURROWS (continuing). Upon the last bill, was to take thirty minutes on this and thirty minutes on the next, because some desire an opportunity to speak on this bill especially and not on the other. And to the other side it could not make any difference.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman answer me? Will not the gentleman consent to three-quarters?

Mr. BURROWS. We could not. There has been but little said——

Mr. MATSON. We only ask half an hour on this side.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman will see I have tried to carry out some arrangement to expedite business.

Mr. MATSON. That is what we desire.

Mr. BURROWS. We desire but thirty minutes on this and thirty minutes on the next.

Mr. MATSON. The proposition as agreed upon here I have already stated. Gentlemen insist that three-quarters on that side and half an hour on this is enough.

Mr. BURROWS. They desire more time on this side of the House.

Mr. MATSON. Then I understand you to say you will not agree to three-quarters.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not say about that.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman answer whether the other side will insist on a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. BURROWS. One vote on them.

Mr. HAMMOND. On one or both?

Mr. BURROWS. One vote, of course, on each of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that these pension matters be laid aside for the present to be taken up to-morrow again, and that to-day we proceed to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the general deficiency bill; and that after those are disposed of to take up other appropriation bills which may be ready for action, and that to-morrow we agree to go on with the debate on these pension bills.

The SPEAKER. There is only one more message.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask by unanimous consent the proposition I have suggested be agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to my honorable friend from Illinois that I understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], who is interested in the veto messages, will be compelled to-morrow to attend the funeral ceremonies of his colleague, and he, of course, will not be able to be here to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then make it Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. RYAN. Let us make it Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. Make it Tuesday.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well; let it be Tuesday. By Tuesday we can get through with both the appropriation bills.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We will save time by going on with this business now.

Mr. VAN EATON. So I think.

Mr. LAWLER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LAWLER. I also object to taking up the time of the House unnecessarily.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope there will be an agreement to allow thirty minutes on this and thirty minutes on the next message.

Mr. MATSON. I am willing to compromise on that by saying fifty-two minutes on that side and thirty minutes on this.

Mr. BURROWS. The other eight minutes is not much to ask, and the proposition I have made is the least time possible we can accept.

Mr. MATSON. Go ahead then.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order. By order of the House thirty minutes are allowed in opposition to the veto which has just been read.

Mr. MATSON. And thirty minutes on this if we shall see fit to occupy it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be the order of the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. MATSON. And the same order as to the next message.

The SPEAKER. As to the next precisely the same order.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

Mr. BOUTELLE Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we might as well recognize, in this matter of discussing these vetoes of private pension bills, that we have reached an issue in this country broader and deeper than any interest involved in any individual case.

The people of the United States are not making any mistake to-day in regard to the issue that is raised before the country. It is not simply the question whether the few soldiers named in these particular bills, or their parents or widows or orphan children, may receive a pension by grant of the House of Representatives and the Senate, composing the Congress of the United States, but the issue raised here, Mr. Speaker, is openly, clearly, and unmistakably joined between the Democratic party of this country, through its Executive and its representatives in Congress, upon the broad question of the duty of recognizing the services and the sacrifices of the men who gave their health or their lives in order that this great nation might be preserved.

There can be no mistake on this point, as the recent outbreak of executive vetoes has been coincident and apparently in concert with the unwonted boldness that has recently characterized the assaults upon pension legislation from the Democratic side of the House. Indeed, there seems to have sprung up a rivalry in this matter of antagonizing pensions for Union soldiers, and at recent Friday night sessions the transaction of business has been practically suspended by the obstructive methods resorted to as a matter of settled policy, as when at the last of those sessions two Representatives from Louisiana vied with each other in opposing a pension for an aged woman whose son was killed by a rebel cannon-shot while in the service of his country in the waters of that State.

Simultaneously with these manifestations among the rank and file, the Democratic leaders of the House, of the Committee on Rules, consisting of Speaker CARLISLE, ex-Speaker RANDALL, and the party leader on the floor, Mr. MORRISON, have brought forward the astonishing proposition that the rules be so amended that no legislation for the disabled veterans of the Republic or their needy dependents could be enacted without having saddled upon it the most odious form of taxation. The pretense that this outrageous invention for rendering pension laws odious was originated out of regard for the soldiers has been effectually disposed of in the debate upon the measure. But I present here the indignant protest made against it by the official representatives of the great organization that embraces a large proportion of the surviving defenders of the Union.

[General Orders, No. 21.]

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1886.

The deep concern felt by the comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic in the pension legislation now pending in Congress, and especially in the provisions embodied in Senate bill No. 1886, has been so abundantly evidenced as to more than justify the earnest protest of the committee on pensions which is below set out. Having from time to time invited the aid of posts and comrades for the advancement of just pension measures, the commander-in-chief now presents for consideration and for such action as will readily suggest itself the unfriendly proposals which are the subject of the protest.

By command of S. S. Burdett, Commander-in-Chief.

JOHN CAMERON, Adjutant-General.

BOSTON, MASS., July 1, 1886.

SAMUEL S. BURDETT,
Commander-in-Chief Grand Army of the Republic:

The committee on pensions, appointed under resolution of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, and authorized to speak therefor, feel impelled, through you, in the name and behalf of three hundred and twenty-five thousand veterans, to enter an emphatic protest against the proposition now pending in Congress to attach to all pension bills—and pension bills only—a measure of special taxation to provide for the payment thereof.

This proposition is not to increase the revenues of the Government for general purposes by new taxation, but in effect a declaration that while all other expenditures of the General Government, for salaries, public buildings, river and harbor improvements, and the like, shall continue to be paid from existing sources of revenue, the debt due to the soldiers and sailors of the Republic, for which the most solemn faith of the nation has been plighted, the pensions to the men who gave sight and hearing, limbs and health, and who offered their lives in defense of the nation, shall mercilessly stand aside, unless subjected to the invidious distinction of a special method of taxation.

That every other obligation of the National Government shall be met from the usual and ordinary revenues, but the obligation to the soldier be singled out and alone made to bear the burden of a new and special tax.

That in the payment of pensions, and pensions alone, one class of the people shall be arrayed against another—the tax-payer against the beneficiary—by providing as to pensions, and for no other form of indebtedness, a particular tax for a specified purpose.

Speaking in behalf of our comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic, we protest against this measure as the most iniquitous possible, and which the Union veterans of the country will resent and repudiate.

Respectfully yours,

G. S. MERRILL,
JAMES TANNER,
JOHN C. LINEHAN,
JOHN S. KOUNTZ,
Committee on Pensions.

But, Mr. Speaker, the manifestation of Democratic purpose and spirit in regard to pensions has not been confined to the White House and the Capitol, but has found expression through the accredited organs of that party. I have before me a newspaper published in the city of New York, which has assumed, and to which has been ascribed, the function of special organ of the national administration in the great commercial emporium of the country; and in that newspaper, in an issue published within the last three days, I find this clear, unmistakable, unequivocal declaration on the part of the mouth-piece of this national administration—I read now from the New York Star, the paper edited by ex-District Attorney Dorsheimer, one of the leading members of the Democratic party in the United States, the personal biographer of the President of the United States, recently the United States district attorney for New York under the appointment of President Cleveland, with whom he has recently been in conference here in Washington. On Tuesday last, in discussing this question of vetoes of pensions, he makes this editorial statement:

These critics of the President should incense themselves very moderately. The country believes that the business of granting pensions is worse than a nuisance, and that it is a fraud upon the Treasury.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the declaration semi-officially made by the administration of the United States Government under the auspices of the Democratic party. We may as well recognize it. There is not a member on this side of the Chamber or on the other side, there is not an intelligent citizen of the United States to-day who does not recognize the fact that we have come to the "parting of the ways;" that we have reached a time when the Democratic party feels itself sufficiently firmly seated in the saddle to express openly and defiantly its hostility to the men who went to the front to save this Union in its hour of peril, and who, after having defeated Democratic rebellion upon a hundred battlefields, have added to their offense in the eyes of Democracy by casting more than 90 per cent. of their votes at the polls in favor of the party that sustained them throughout the war and that now seeks to do justice to "him who shall have borne the battle, and his widow and his orphans."

We have presented here a spectacle unparalleled in the history of the country. The great general court of the United States, sitting here for the calm consideration and grave examination of public matters, have decided, upon unanimous reports of their committees, and by the unanimous votes of the two houses in many cases, that it was becoming and proper for this great and rich Government to extend in this its hour of prosperity and wealth, a little dole, a little pittance to some one-legged or one-armed soldier, to some veteran, dragged down by disease or weakened or disabled by the unutterable horrors of Southern prison-pens; or to grant to some widow left—as in one case recently vetoed—with seven children to support, the small sum of $12 a month to help her to feed and clothe and educate as good citizens the offspring of the patriot who laid down his life under our flag; and it remained for the President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate of fifty millions of people, to refuse his assent to that slight act of justice to that widow; and not only that, but to send it back to the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, coupled with a slur upon the chastity of the mother who had asked so little at the hands of the great Government for which she had sacrificed so much.

Twelve dollars a month! One hundred and forty-four dollars a year to care for the widow and seven fatherless children of one of the dead soldiers of this Republic, snatched from her after it had been granted by Congress, by the veto of a President surrounded by every luxury, and for the mere decoration of whose table at a single repast the people have contributed more for flowers than would pension several such widowed households for a year. Not that the people, rich or poor, grudge the Chief Magistrate the elegancies befitting the exalted station he occupies, but the thought can not be repressed that the generosity of the people should beget in return a thoughtfulness for the Nation's especial wards, the sorrowing ones whose blood and tears have purchased our great deliverance and rendered possible the prosperity out of which they have a right to be remembered.

I read, sir, a few days ago, in a paper published in this city an account of the marvelous industry of our Chief Magistrate in this crusade that he has inaugurated against the veteran soldiers of his country. I find that one hundred and forty-one cases that he has considered have been disposed of by him within ten days, or two hundred and forty hours, counting night and day; so that if he had sat up nights and gone without food and rest he would have devoted but two hours apiece to the pension cases which had occupied the attention of Representatives and Senators, some of them, for weeks and months.

I find it stated in regard to one batch of these bills that he occupied only between the hours of 10 o'clock in the morning and 3 o'clock in the afternoon to dispose of nineteen veto messages in pension cases, five hours in all; but allowing an hour for luncheon, which would not be an unreasonable time for a gentleman of his avoirdupois, it would leave four hours, two hundred and forty minutes, or less than thirteen minutes for the President to dispose of each case—cases, too, some of which had occupied the careful attention of the committees of the two branches of Congress for months at a time.

That is the calm, judicial review upon which the President seeks to set aside the deliberately expressed judgment of the Senate and the House of Representatives! And this newspaper further tells us that the President was jocular over his work. It says:

In writing his veto messages the President was quick to take advantage of any discrepancies in the reasons given for allowing pensions, and made them appear in very terse language, sometimes with a vein of humor.

"A vein of humor!" God help the nation whose Chief Executive can find no more fitting subject for his gibes than the battered wrecks of a great war from which he held aloof; the widows and the orphans of those who may sleep in unknown graves where they fell, but whose white foreheads have felt the kiss of angels.

Truly it has been said that the spirit and the style of these veto messages have no precedent, and it is safe to say that in his heartless sneers at the unfortunate he need fear no future rival or imitator.

With great questions of national and international importance pressing for action; with a scandal in his Cabinet so gross that his own party papers demand his attention to it; with our fishery interests paralyzed by foreign aggression, of which it seems impossible to induce the administration to take note; with daily affronts to our flag and arbitrary seizures of our vessels by the petty authorities of a British colony, calling aloud for the exercise of statesmanship, or at least some show of interest, the Executive head of this great Nation can find nothing more important to do than to haggle with Congress about a few private pensions, and the papers announce that he denies himself to callers on business and postpones Cabinet meetings in order to devote himself undisturbed to the grinding of his grist of pension vetoes! What employment for a great statesman in his honeymoon—cracking poor jokes at sick soldiers and glibly arguing away the little pension that would barely keep the wolf of hunger from the door of some destitute but loyal home!

My God, Mr. Speaker, what a spectacle this presents! I think I can see the muse of history looking at the grand procession of the Chief Magistrates of this country, seeking out the illustrious features in the lives of each to be depicted in the great pantheon of American history, and I can imagine the expression of ineffable disgust which would pass over the features——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROWS yielded five minutes' additional time to Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I say, sir, I can imagine the change of expression—I will not characterize it, for I need not—which would pass over the features of the Goddess of Liberty as she might be called upon to survey the allegorical representations of the characteristic achievements of our great rulers, frescoed forth in the Rotunda of the Capitol, as her gaze should first rest upon the picture of Abraham Lincoln standing on the battlefield of Gettysburg, amid the graves of the heroes of the Union, and there dedicating and pledging for all time to come the gratitude of the American people to the Nation's defenders; and then passing to the next panel, upon which should be delineated with all the felicity of art the picture of the Chief Magistrate of to-day, sitting in his shirt-sleeves, with his collar unbuttoned, perspiring over the vetoes of little pension bills to the heroes of the American Republic. [Applause.]

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to advert in detail to many phases of this question that ought to be discussed here, but I do desire to call attention to one statement that has been made repeatedly upon the floor of this House.

A few days ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in his attempt to set up the claim that the Democratic party had been the only friend of the soldier since the war, made this statement:

Who was it that repealed the limitation upon arrears, and gave the soldiers whose cases were pending their pension from the date of their disability? It was the Democratic party. Oh!

I do not wonder that he said "Oh!" And a few days ago the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, refusing to allow an interruption to correct him and insisting on the correctness of his statement, reiterated the assertion that it was the Democratic party that had passed the arrears-of-pension bill. On Wednesday, July 7, the following colloquy took place:

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?
Mr. MATSON. I do not. Gentlemen say that the comparison between the two parties as to their course on this subject shows the balance on their side. I will submit, and gladly submit, to the soldiers of this country the question as to where the balance is. All the legislation friendly to the soldier that has amounted to anything since the war has been given by a Democratic House of Representatives.
Mr. BRUMM. By Republican votes.
Mr. MATSON. It was a Democratic House that originated, and under the leadership of General Rice, a one-legged Democratic soldier, passed the original bill giving arrears of pensions.
Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman state the vote as it was given in the House?
Mr. MATSON. I decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to place on record here and now the vote by which the arrears-of-pensions bill was passed. On the 19th day of January, 1878, the bill granting arrears of pensions, a bill that had been introduced by Mr. Cummings, of Iowa, a Republican, was called up by Mr. Haskell, of Kansas, a Republican. It was passed by a vote of 164 to 61. The entire negative vote was cast by Democrats; 58 of the 61 Democratic votes coming from the Solid South. Of the 164 votes in favor of the bill 116 were Republican, and only 48 Democratic. It was a Republican measure, inaugurated by Republicans, and passed by Republican votes.

In making the statement that the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Indiana have repeated here they have indulged in both the suppressio veri and the suggestio falsi. I deny that the Democratic party are entitled to any credit for that great act of liberality to the Union soldier, and I could show if I had time that since the war upon every and all occasions when the rights of Union soldiers have been involved the solid adverse vote has been given by the Democratic party. The record would also throw a strong side-light upon the claim so often made here that the Democratic members who were formerly confederates have been especially liberal and chivalrous in their support of pensions for the soldiers who upheld the Government. Let me cite a few illustrations:

December 14, 1875, Mr. Fort, in the House, offered the following:

Resolved, That in all subordinate appointments under any officers of this House, wounded Union soldiers, who are not disabled from performance of duty, should be preferred.

Mr. Cox, of New York, Democrat, offered a substitute entirely neutralizing the idea expressed, and subsequently moved to commit the subject to the Committee on Accounts; which was carried by 168 to 102, every Democrat voting for committal and every Republican against it.

January 5, 1876, a resolution was offered instructing the officers of the House "to give well qualified Union soldiers preference over soldiers of the late confederate army." Fernando Wood, Democrat, moved its reference to the "Committee on the Centennial Celebration," which prevailed—122 to 93; every affirmative vote being Democratic, every negative vote, except 7, Republican. Every Southern Democrat voted against the recognition of Union soldiers, constituting 69 of the 122, and defeating the proposition.

February 3, 1879, a bill was passed by a vote of 140 to 81 providing for the issue of bonds to be sold for the payment of the arrears of pensions. Of the votes against it 78 were Democratic, and 69 of those were from the South.

February 17, 1879, the pension appropriation bill with provisions covering the arrears of pensions, &c., was passed in the House by 183 yeas; the entire negative vote, 67, being Democratic, 62 of them from the South.

It would be easy to show that the same hostility manifested toward Union soldiers by the Democratic party under the lead of its Southern wing has been brought to bear against every great interest of the Government. Going back to 1871 we find that on March 13 of that year a resolution was offered in the House reciting that the Legislature of Indiana had voted to rescind the vote whereby it had previously ratified the fifteenth amendment, and declaring that a State having once lawfully ratified could not rescind its action, and that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were duly ratified and binding upon all. This was agreed to by a vote of 109 to 76, only 4 Democrats voting for the resolution. All the negative votes were Democrats, of whom 42 were from the South.

February 5, 1872, Mr. Peters, of Maine, offered a resolution to the effect that the constitutional amendments having been adopted legally "the highest patriotism and most enlightened public policy demand of all political parties and all citizens an acquiescence in the validity of such constitutional provisions and such reasonable legislation as may be necessary to make them most effectual." This was adopted 124 to 58, with only eight Democrats in the affirmative; the negative votes being all given by Democrats, 38 of them from the South.

February 12, 1872, the following resolution was passed:

That we recognize as valid and binding all existing laws passed by Congress for the enforcement of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and for the protection of citizens in their rights under the Constitution as amended.

The vote on this was 107 to 65. Not a Democrat voted for it. All voting against it were Democrats, 35 being from the South.

March 13, 1876, Mr. J. H. Baker offered a resolution reciting that this is one Nation and not a mere confederacy &c.; that no State can alone judge of or nullify the Federal laws; that all overt acts against constitutional law constitute treason; "and that the late war of the rebellion was causeless and indefensible on any theory of right or constitutional law."

It was lost for want of two-thirds, the vote being 97 to 75, a majority of Northern Democrats dodging. Of the 75 Democratic votes against this proposition, 58 were from the late rebel States.

January 17, 1876, on a resolution in favor of repealing the resumption act the vote was 112 yeas, 158 nays. Of the 112 thus recorded against resumption 106 were Democrats, of whom 62 were from the South.

August 5, 1876, Mr. Cox reported a bill declaring that the "resumption-day clause in the resumption act of 1875," "be, and the same is hereby, repealed." Passed 106 to 86. All the yeas except 9 were by Democrats, of whom 54 were from the South.

June 5, 1878, the Wood (free-trade) tariff bill being under consideration, the House voted to strike out the enacting clause, 134 to 120. Of the 120 free-trade votes 115 were Democratic, 76 of which were from the South.

December 1, 1877, Mr. MILLS, of Texas, moved a resolution declaring in favor of "purely and solely a tariff for revenue" and against protection. It received 67 votes, of which 61 were Democratic and 48 of them from the South.

May 5, 1884, on the vote to strike out the enacting clause of the Morrison tariff bill the vote stood yeas 159, nays 155, and of the nays 87 were from the South.

And so I might go on if my time would permit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to have three minutes more.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is a class of pensions to which the Democracy does not seem to be so entirely adverse. It is only the pensions of the Union soldiers that find antagonism on that side. A bill to pension alleged Mexican soldiers, whether they had or had never reached the scene of battle or whether they had or not even embarked on a vessel bound for the shores of Mexico, has passed this House and went over to the other end of the Capitol, and I venture to say if passed there it would receive the ready signature of the present Executive. That is the class of bills that receive favor with the Democratic party.

That bill would place on the pension-rolls thousands of men who fought against the Government all through the rebellion, and yet when a similar House bill was sent back from the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress, with some amendments, for the benefit of loyal soldiers and their dependents, seventy-two Democrats in the House who on March 3, 1884, had voted for a measure that was largely in the interests of participants in rebellion, voted stubbornly against it January 5, 1885, when coupled with provisions for the relief of disabled veterans of the Union, and their mothers, widows, and orphans, and of the House votes cast against the bill as amended by the Senate 67 were from the late confederate states.

I have another illustration. Here is a bill [holding it up] now under consideration by a committee of this House, introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, a gentleman standing high in the councils of the Democratic party and already spoken of in connection with the position of chief law officer of the Government. It is a bill (H. R. 8971) introduced by Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, on May 18, to place "the name of Nicholas H. Van Zandt, late a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States," on the pension-rolls and to pay him a pension of $75 a month.

It is asked that this man be given on the ground of deafness alleged to have been contracted more than thirty years ago a pension $3 more a month than the highest rate given to cases of totally disabled soldiers of the Union—with the sole exception of Pension Commissioner Black, who got $100 by a special act that was not vetoed—and throughout the papers submitted in the case there is not a suggestion that this man was ever any other than a faithful officer of the United States Navy. And yet we find in the records of the Navy Department, the official transcript of which I hold in my hand, and will make part of my remarks, we find the facts to be that on November 26, 1861, Lieutenant Van Zandt tendered his resignation to the Department, as follows:

As I can not take the required oath of allegiance, I hereby respectfully tender my resignation of the commission which I hold as lieutenant in the United States Navy.

On December 24, 1861, Lieutenant Van Zandt was dismissed from the naval service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A confederate naval register, now in possession of the Department, shows that Mr. Van Zandt was commissioned a first lieutenant in the confederate navy December 7, 1861. This man was dismissed from the service——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, who had been rapping with the gavel, said: The Chair calls on the gentleman from Maine to submit to the rules of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Another minute is yielded to me.

Mr. ELY. I am to be recognized, and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thank the gentleman, and will endeavor not to occupy the whole of that time.

I can hardly understand the indisposition manifested on the other side to listen to these matters of public record. Here is a bill introduced by a leading Democrat of this House, a man who long since reached the years of maturity, a leading lawyer on the Democratic side of the House. The bill is now pending before a committee of this House. I stand here to tell you that this measure introduced here, and which this House is asked to pass, giving this man $3 more a month than is given to the men who have lost both eyes or both hands or both feet in the service of their country, is for the benefit of a man who, as I am credibly informed, deserted the service of the country before he sent in his resignation. He resigned, as the record shows, in November, 1861, in the face of the enemy, and was dismissed in December, 1861, from the Navy of the United States. Within eleven days of the date of his resignation he enlisted and was commissioned as an officer in the confederate navy. This is the class of men that the Democrats of this House of Representatives ask that we shall pass pension bills for, not at the rate of $6 or $8 or $12 a month, but at the rate of $75 a month, to pay them for their dastardly treason to the Government in the hour of its need.

[Extract from the record of Nicholas H. Van Zandt, late lieutenant United States Navy.]

1861, July 20. Detached on account of ill health and placed on waiting orders.

1861, November 26. Lieutenant Van Zandt tendered his resignation to the Department, as follows:

"As I can not conscientiously take the required oath of allegiance, I respectfully hereby tender my resignation of the commission which I hold as a lieutenant in the United States Navy."

1861, December 24. Lieutenant Van Zandt was dismissed from the naval service.

A confederate navy register now in the possession of the Department shows that Nicholas H. Van Zandt was commissioned a first lieutenant in the Confederate navy December 7, 1861.

A true abstract from the records of the Department.

JOHN W. HOGG, Chief Clerk.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the manner in which votes have been divided in some striking cases on this floor. Of the 78 votes that were cast March 3, 1885, against putting Ulysses S. Grant upon the retired list of the United States Army, 66 were cast by Democrats who on February 1, 1884, voted to put Fitz-John Porter on that list. Of those 78 Democrats, 58 were from the States that were engaged in the rebellion; unwilling to pay tribute to the great chieftain of our armies, eager to reward the man to whom they were indebted for a confederate success. Fifty-one of those Democrats are members of this House, and every one of them who was present voted again at this session to bestow upon Fitz-John Porter the honor which they had refused to Ulysses S. Grant.

Of the 77 votes cast against Porter in the House only one was cast by a Democrat, and his constituency put him promptly under the guillotine. Thirty-four of the Democrats who in the Forty-eighth Congress voted to restore Fitz-John Porter to the honors and pay of a colonel in the United States Army, voted in this Congress that they would not allow the widows of Union soldiers, many of whom lost their lives through Porter's recreancy, to have their pensions increased from $8 to $12 a month. Of 66 votes and two pairs announced against the increase of the widows' pensions all but 2 were cast by Representatives from the States lately in rebellion, the two exceptions being the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and nobody will want to dispute with them the glory of that vote.

Mr. Speaker, I took occasion to run over the roster of that vote against the widows' pension bill.

Mr. BURROWS. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want just one minute more.

Mr. BURROWS. I will yield the gentleman half a minute.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to put the responsibility of that vote against the widows' pension bill where it belongs. I find by the Congressional Directory that it was a remarkably representative vote of the late Confederate States. It embraced:

One ex-Confederate Postmaster-general and Acting Secretary of the Treasury;
Two ex-Confederate Congressmen;
One ex-Confederate State Attorney-general;
One ex-Confederate Corps Commander;
Five ex-Confederate Brigadier-generals;
Seven ex-Confederate Colonels;
Two ex-Confederate Lieutenant-colonels;
Two ex-Confederate Majors;
Seven ex-Confederate Lieutenants;
One ex-Confederate Midshipman; and Four ex-Confederate Privates.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

As I look over that chivalric list, Mr. Speaker, I seem to hear again the plaintively mellifluous tones of the gentleman from Kentucky, whom I do not now see in his seat [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who became so enraptured with the reminiscences of his own experience as a barefooted boy in the beautiful blue-grass region of Kentucky, that he could not bring his conscience to permit him to vote the little pittance of $4 more a month to enable the widows of Union soldiers who died for their country to put shoes upon their little barefooted boys who have to fight against the rigorous winters of that Northern land where the patriotism was bred that saved that flag [pointing to the stars and stripes suspended over the Speaker's chair] in the hour of peril. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BURROWS. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, if there is any one thing in this world that the Democratic party has assumed to be consistent in heretofore, it is opposition to centralized power in the Government. If there is anything, gentlemen on the Democratic side, that you have been consistent in, it has been your advocacy of State sovereignty and your advocacy of the segregation of the several powers in the co-ordinate branches of this Government.

You have stood consistent in attempting to keep the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary separate in their respective branches. But now your Executive, following in the line of his conduct as governor of the State of New York, and following the footsteps of the governor of Pennsylvania, Mr. Pattison, has become the great obliterator of segregated rights and the great representative of concentrated and absolute power. In England, though under her constitution the crowned head has the power to veto any act of Parliament just as absolutely as the President of the United States has with respect to acts of Congress, yet since 1707 no executive head of England has ever dared to veto one act of Parliament. The worst despotism in the world would not tolerate such a wholesale exercise of the veto power by its executive. It is left for this republican Government of ours to have an Executive who not only exercises the use of this power, but indulges in the abuses of it by vetoing bills, not for constitutional reasons, not because of alleged frauds, not because of manifest errors, but simply because he chooses to set up his judgment against that of three hundred and twenty-five Representatives and every Senator of the United States. And yet you Democrats stand by and say "Thy will be done, not mine," and tell us, as one of your party has said, "I am glad we have found a man in Cleveland who has shown the nerve and courage to veto these bills." Then he is the only man of nerve and courage in your party, and by inference you are all poltroons and cowards. Have you passed these bills without judgment? Have you allowed these bills to go through your committees without objection and to pass here by a unanimous vote without knowing what you were about? [Cries of "Louder!" on the Democratic side.] Ah, it is loud enough to reach every quarter of this country; and that is what you do not like. You have passed these bills, and the President by implication tells you you are unfit to judge the merits of the cases, and like sheep you stand here ready to submit to anything that the President may dictate to you; thus acknowledging your weakness and utter unfitness for your positions.

Why, sir, even the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions says that the President has vetoed these bills because of technicalities and because cases were undisposed of in the Pension Office. What right, under the spirit of our Constitution, has the President of the United States to discuss technicalities not of the fundamental law or Constitution? It is because we want to overcome technicalities connected with the general law that we pass these special acts. But for technicalities Congress would not have to pass these special acts. Yet, though the very purpose of these special bills is to obviate technical difficulties, you allow your President to slap you in the face and spit upon you whenever he chooses, and then you honor him as a man of nerve and courage, forgetting that often "fools rush in where angels fear to tread," and that ignorance is often mistaken for bravery.

Your retrenchment and reform policy, instead of beginning where it would do some good, begins with the scrubwomen, with the small offices, held in most instances by soldiers. There is your retrenchment and reform. You refuse pensions to soldiers' widows on technical grounds and because the Department has not yet acted upon them, and you whitewash the traitor and pay him thousands in spite of constitutional reasons given by a former President, following the reasons given by Attorney-General Brewster in his able opinion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires more time I will yield him five minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. Speaker, the action of this House reminds me very much of a part of a scene in the play of Hamlet. In reading it I shall substitute for the young Prince of Denmark your courageous man of nerve, President Cleveland, and for poor old Polonius I will substitute the poor miserable cowards—I am using by inference your own language, gentlemen of the Democratic party:

Hamlet—

Or rather I should say—

CLEVELAND. Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?
DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS. By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.
CLEVELAND. Methinks it is like a weasel.
DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS. It is backed like a weasel.
CLEVELAND. Or like a whale?
DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS. Very like a whale.

[Great laughter.]

And so this Executive of yours has only to point out what shall be their form; no matter how hideous, and without reason, without constitutional right, in spirit, at least, the Democratic Congress has not the manliness to assert it rights, but humbly gets down on its marrowbones to say, "Mr. President, as thou wilt, so shall it be, for thou art dictator." I reserve the balance of my time. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. MATSON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I never supposed anybody would blame the President because the veto power was put into the Constitution; a power which we all know has been exercised by every Republican President who ever occupied that chair.

As to the merits of these vetoes, when they come before the House in a proper shape after investigation by the Committee on Invalid Pensions the House will be in a better condition to judge whether we should sustain or override the vetoes.

And I desire to say a word or two in reply to remarks made on the other side of the House as to the friendliness of the Democratic or Republican party to our soldiers.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day stated these vetoes meant no more pension legislation would be allowed during this administration. How he could make that statement in the face of the facts I do not know, but I will say this, however, that if one-half of the pledges of the Republican party had been redeemed when that party was in power no pension legislation would be needed under this administration or any other.

The claim has also been made by some members on the other side of the House that when the arrearage act of 1878 was passed and the widows' increase pension bill during this Congress was passed a large number of Democrats voted against those bills while nearly all the Republicans voted for them. It strikes me as remarkably strange the Republican members of this House never could get an opportunity to vote for the arrearage or the widows' pension act until they got it in a Democratic House. Why did they not introduce an arrearage act when they had the power? They were in continuous control of the Government in every department of it from the close of the war down to the election of the Forty-fourth Congress, and yet not one of them ever thought of an arrearage act until the Democrats got a majority in this House, when that act was reported by a constituent of mine, General Rice, as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and was passed by a Democratic House. So, too, in the Forty-seventh Congress, when my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions they did not introduce a bill, or at least report one, to increase the pension of soldiers' widows from $8 to $12 per month. That bill was introduced by the present Democratic chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON] in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, and through his influence and energy it has become a law at the present session.

Let us see what has been the administration of the Pension Bureau under Democratic and Republican rule. I hold in my hand a table which is official, and which shows the number of claims allowed in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, 37,895; number of claims allowed in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, 61,704; number of claims allowed in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, 57,930. That was when the department was under the administration of a Republican Commissioner.

The number of claims allowed in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, first year of General Black's administration, 81,422.

Number of pension certificates issued from March 17, 1884, to March 17, 1885, 74,069; number of pension certificates issued from March 17, 1885, to March 17, 1886, first year of General Black's administration, 82,977; number of claims allowed under special act of Forty-seventh Congress, 196. During the whole of the Forty-seventh Congress, under the control of the Republican party in both branches, with a Republican President in the White House to approve its acts, they only passed one hundred and ninety-six bills.

The President of the United States has already, by his approval and allowing bills to become law without his signature, placed upon the statutue-book five hundred and fifty-five special cases. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], on the other side, said during the Forty-seventh Congress, when he was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, only four hundred reports were made from that committee. The Committee on Invalid Pensions at this session has made nine hundred and sixty reports, and we have passed more than six hundred pension bills, five out of six of which have become laws. So if gentlemen on the other side would measure their sincerity by their hypocrisy every one of them would get down on their knees and thank God that a Democratic Congress has enabled them to do what a Republican Congress did not do, that is, to redeem their pledges made to their Republican constituents. [Laughter and applause.]

This is the record, and it makes no difference whether these bills were passed or by whose votes; the party in power which has on its shoulders the responsibility of legislation is the party which should always get the credit for these things.

If my time has not expired I want to yield the balance of it to Governor CURTIN, of Pennsylvania, in addition to what he will get from the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I yield, then, fourteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Governor CURTIN.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, if a foreigner, an intelligent man, had been in the galleries of this House during the debate on these pension bills to-day and other days, he would have taken home to his country the impression that the American people had put into the Presidential office a man not worthy of trust, and who had day after day violated his oath of office.

A MEMBER (on the Republican side). And he would have been right.

Mr. CURTIN. Well, I do not know whether he would have been right or not; but I have taught myself in my life to believe when the free people of the United States elected their executive officer, when they selected a man to fill this the highest office that has ever existed in ancient or modern times, that the man so selected is entitled at least to decent respect and decent speech.

I do not know what this bill is about. It is a pension bill, but its merits are not presented to the House. But this House has resolved itself into a political meeting, and on the one side and on the other we are discussing the lists of pensions granted, the bills signed, and the bills vetoed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have certain duties to perform in this House. We pass laws to pension, and other laws, at our pleasure, and I can speak on this question without bias, because I voted for every pension bill presented in this House since I have been a member of it and expect to vote on in the same way. But when we resolve ourselves into a political meeting you must understand before the election comes the people on whom you rely to return you to a seat on this floor will forget all you say. [Laughter.] We must not forget that the people will give little heed to what occurs on this floor at this time; and gentlemen might as well reserve their eloquence when they appear for another election, because that is what you mean. I am out of that category, and can therefore speak freely. I am not looking for votes for the present, and you all are or rather a great many of you. And you commence your campaign early; you commence it at the very time when we should be attending to the pressing public business of the country. If we do not turn our attention to the business which is intrusted to our hands we will be here until the middle or last of August; and how many strong, sturdy men here can know when the grim messenger shall open these portals and seize another of his victims?

Whether the President is right or wrong is for himself to determine; he is acting in the performance of a grave and solemn public duty, for he has a duty to perform as well as we have. He has a right to examine bills that are passed by both Houses of Congress. He has a right to veto the bills if they do not come up to his conscientious convictions of duty, no matter whether the bill be a pension bill or some great public measure. If he is wrong in the facts or in the law, the House has the power to direct the reference of the veto messages to the committee for reconsideration; and if he is found to be in error, that is the time to vote. All this vituperation and abuse of the President is sublimely ridiculous and wrong and of no consequence to the country, except as a contribution to the literature and eloquence of members. One gallant gentleman from the West, who served the country handsomely, the other day, full of emphasis, after denouncing the President and holding him up to ridicule, while not forgetful of the fact that the future safety of his own soul was secured, offered a fervent prayer that the souls of men on this side of the House may be secured. My friend, when we want another prayer for our welfare we will go to the Chaplain or to some other man in the ordination and enjoyment of the rights of a teacher of the gospel and charged with instructions which may save the souls of others, if properly believed and practiced. [Laughter.] I have no doubt the addition to the apotheosis proposed by the gallant and elegant gentleman from Maine may expand in the future to very elegant proportions, but I do object to his putting the President of the United States, a high official of this Government—and remember, gentlemen, he was elected, there is no controversy about that—I do object to his undertaking to put him in the wrong for exercising his constitutional prerogatives. I repeat, he was elected to that high office.

The man in this country who gets the most votes has a right to his office, and the present incumbent of the White House was as fairly elected as ever Abraham Lincoln or George Washington was. Who doubts that he was elected? The people of the United States elected him, the returns were sent here, they were counted in the presence of this House, and the Vice-President of the United States declared him to be elected, and being so elected he has conscientious duties to perform. I assert my entire confidence in the integrity of the President of the United States and in his desire to do his duty, and when pension bills come before us I reserve to myself the right to approve or disapprove his vetoes, but will always vote in these cases to give the soldiers of the Union all that this country is able to give, and I have a right to say that I am the peer of any citizen of the United States in giving to the soldiers who survive the homage of gratitude justly due them for saving the Government and a full reward for their services.

Now, suppose we quit this quarreling and turn our attention to public business. Why, sir, the heat of debate, the violence of denunciation, are painful as pronounced on this floor, a subordinate branch of this Government, in defamation of its highest official as well as in charge of want of integrity and of manifest disposition to forget that the President has important official functions to perform and constitutional powers he is sworn to obey. Oh, my fellow members, let me take you back to your infancy. [Laughter.] I will not repeat to you the cradle hymn; you all remember it. But at the knee of your mother you were taught lessons which through life have given you consequence enough to be elected members on this floor. In this angry heat, this violent vituperation, remember what she said to you:

> Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
> For God has made them so;
> Let bears and lions growl and fight,
> For 'tis their nature too.

And now I address myself to you:

> But, children, you should never let
> Such angry passions rise;
> Your little hands were never made
> To tear each other's eyes.

[Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a great deal is said here about the confederates in connection with this subject of pensions, and I have heard it said here several times when ex-confederates have by their vote or speech signified a desire to put some sort of limitation on the amount to be expended for pensions that we ought to have thought of that twenty-five years ago. Being one of the four ex-confederate privates referred to by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], it may be that I should apologize for assuming to open my mouth while this question of pension legislation is under discussion.

I am free to confess, Mr. Speaker, that at the beginning of the war a little more than twenty-five years ago I probably did not give this matter the careful consideration the gravity of the subject demanded. I do not plead the baby act, but I was then quite a youth, and was probably stimulated somewhat by my youthful impetuosity, but about the third or fourth year of the war I began to think very seriously about the matter [laughter], and began to suspect that probably we had made a mistake; and, sir, I claim the right to speak about it now, because I then showed great consideration for the Federal soldiery. So much was I impressed with the fact that the way I was then going on, producing such havoc in the ranks of the Union armies, would finally bankrupt the United States Treasury to pay the pensions [laughter], that to avoid this result I began to retire in front of the advancing army, and with loaded gun in hand I retreated, in company with many of my comrades, across about three States [laughter], until finally I was so cornered and hemmed in that the only alternative left me was to destroy the whole Union Army or surrender myself. [Laughter.] And out of consideration for said army and the wives and children of the soldiers and the future pension-rolls of the country I surrendered like a man, and gave up my gun and went home. [Laughter.]

But it is to a little incident that happened as I went home after the surrender that I wish to call the attention of the House. I had entered the army at the age of fourteen and had been out four years. I went home in company with a boy a little older than myself, but who had not been out so long. I had had enough of war and was quite willing to quit, but my comrade, with the fiery impetuosity that usually characterizes the new soldier, did not like to give it up, and he insisted it was our duty to cross the Mississippi River and join and fight with Kirby Smith on the other side, while I insisted on going home. As this controversy was going on between us we were riding along in the prairies of Alabama. An old gentleman living some distance from the road saw us coming and he came down to the road and took his seat on the fence to see us and learn what he could about the surrender. He had a great many darkies and was anxious to know what had become of "our institution" (slavery). We told him it was gone up. [Laughter.] My comrade and I then submitted our controversy about crossing the river to him, when he said to me: "Young man, you are right; go home and go to plowing that horse you are on"—which advice I took. Said he, "I am older than you, and my judgment is that when you fight and get cleaned up you should give it up and go at something else and make the best of the situation."

He then began to talk about the war. Said he: "This has been a mighty bad war. We have lost many of our brightest and best men. We have many one-legged, one-armed, and disabled men who will have a hard struggle for a living. There are many poor widows and orphans (God help them) in our midst. Society has been greatly demoralized. Our property is all gone and we are all poor. Our homes have been devastated and desolated. Oh," said he, with the tears running down his cheeks, "it has been a terrible war, and it will be a long time before we recover from it!" And then breaking out in a cry he said: "But we could stand all this, and finally recover from it and build up again our country, our homes, and our fortunes; but the thing that troubles me is that twenty-five years from now there will be d——d fools who didn't make any reputation in the war who will be throwing this thing up to us." [Great laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, I make no application of what that old gentleman then said [laughter], but it does seem that his were words of prophetic wisdom. [Great applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I hope at some time, when I have more time, to discuss this subject of pensions from the standpoint of a Southern Representative and an ex-confederate soldier.

The previous question was ordered—ayes 122, noes none.

The message and accompanying bill, under the operation of the previous question, were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOSEPH ROMISER.

The Speaker also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 1059, entitled "An act to grant a pension to Joseph Romiser."

The Pension Bureau reports that the records of the office fail to show that an application has been filed in favor of this claimant, though it is stated in the report of the House committee that such a claim was made and rejected on the ground that the claimant was not at the time of injury in the service of the United States.

It certainly appears from the report of the committee that the beneficiary named in this bill was not in the service of the Government at such a time, and also that he had not been mustered into the service of any State military organization. It is stated that he belonged to Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, of Frostburg, in the State of Maryland.

Whether this company was organized for the purpose of co-operating at any time with the Union or State forces is not alleged, and it may well have been existing merely for the purpose of neighborhood protection.

Such as it was, the company was ordered in June, 1861, to proceed to Cumberland to repel a threatened attack of confederate forces. Upon arriving at that place the men were ordered to uncap their muskets. In doing this, and through the negligence of another member of the company whose musket was discharged, the claimant was wounded.

It does not seem to me that the facts in this case, so far as they have been developed, justify the passage of this act.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, thirty minutes are allowed for debate in opposition to the veto, and thirty minutes, if required, in support of it. Then the vote will be taken on referring the message and accompanying bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I fear that not more than twenty members on the other side have listened to the reading of that short veto of the bill to pension my constituent, Joseph Romiser. Had you all heard it, gentlemen, I would have had, what I have anyhow, the right to challenge your honor and your consciences, independent of party, to say, after I have briefly stated his case, whether upon the few facts (and there are but three main facts in this man's case) the action of Congress should be overridden—to say whether Joseph Romiser, a minute-man and soldier of the Union, who was shot through the head, in the ranks, in the line of duty, while a member of a citizen company acting under command of a United States officer, General Lew. Wallace, then colonel of the Eleventh Indiana Zouaves, repelling an expected attack upon Cumberland, Md.—to say whether he ought to be robbed of the pension due to his patriotic service and wounds because President Cleveland has made a blunder. That he has blundered there is no doubt. He has made several blunders in this single case.

I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the charge made by the President in this veto message of gross carelessness against that committee. If the gentlemen of the Pension Committee listened they heard read this charge against them in the message as read. The President says that although the Committee on Invalid Pensions state that this man Joseph Romiser had filed a claim for pension and it had been rejected, he had never in fact filed such a claim and it never had been rejected. I admit, sir, that if that were true the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and those who acted with him had indeed been guilty of gross carelessness; but if it is not true, if the President is wrong and these gentlemen are right, then he was guilty of a grosser carelessness, because the report of the committee had notified him of the existence of these papers in the Pension Office, and he could have obtained them easily. As soon as I had read the veto I went to the room of the committee and I found, as I expected, record evidence that they did have the papers and that they returned them to the Pension Office on the 16th day of May. I had thrice gone to the Pension Office during three winters to examine the papers in this unfortunate man's case, and I had found them without difficulty.

Within an hour after the message came here which disclosed the fact that the President had ruthlessly put his hand to a veto of this bill without having ever examined the case, I telephoned for the papers, and they came promptly, and I hold in my hand now the "jacket" and the papers which the President of the United States has said do not exist. Because the President has made that grievous blunder, because he has never looked at the case, he overrides by his veto the convincing report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWOPE], that careful and conscientious Democratic member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions; overrides the report of Senator WILSON, the distinguished Senator from my own State—a learned and able judge, who has spent years in trying causes. The President overrides without consideration the action of both Houses of Congress, without ever having looked at the papers in the case, and that is grosser carelessness than any he has charged upon the committee or Congress.

What is the case in which the President does this? Joseph Romiser's case is a matter of history. I have here from the Congressional Library Colonel Lowdermilk's admirable history of Cumberland, Md., which has been in print eight years. Two pages of this book tell the history of Joseph Romiser's patriotic spirit and his misfortune; how, in the ranks of Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteer soldiery, in the defense of his country, he was shot accidentally, when the company were uncapping their guns, by a musket in the hands of a comrade, Alpheus Beall, the bullet going into the neck back of the ear, going through the inner ear and destroying his hearing, coming out under the eye and blinding that eye; the eminent surgeon who attended him, afterward a surgeon in our Army, declaring that, from the sympathetic ophthalmia, he may go blind in the other eye. The heavy minie-ball broke the jaw at its ramus, making its exit through the molar bone below the eye. There was exfoliation of the bone, terrible deformity of the face, followed by months of lingering suffering and twenty-five years of neuralgia, and a legacy of pain for life. In requital he receives no pay, no bounty, no pension, but instead the President's veto.

Now, who was Joseph Romiser, and when and where did he receive this wound? He was a minute-man of the Union cause. He served under an officer of the Union Army. I will tell you how. As early as the 19th of June, 1861, there was apprehension in the beautiful mountain city of Cumberland, in Western Maryland. Lew. Wallace, then a colonel, had gone yonder to guard the Upper Potomac, where the Virginians had burned the bridges in order to break the communications of the West with Washington. They had burned the bridge over the canal and the bridge over the North Branch of the Potomac. The home-guards had gone to New Creek and were there driven back by a force of the enemy from Virginia. Lew. Wallace guarded the city with his Indiana zouaves; he had his stores there, and the Baltimore and Ohio road had to be guarded to keep up communication between Washington and the West, and he called upon the people to aid him in its defense.

Patriotic fire was then, as now, native to that air, and from Frostburg, from the mountains and the valleys, from the farms and the mines our people hurried in response to his call, as later these sturdy miners went almost in regiments in response to President Lincoln's call. At this time a body of young men, among them this poor carpenter, Joseph Romiser, poor but brave and true, were going to enlist. Some were going to enlist in Western Maryland; some were going to join my friend here in West Virginia [Mr. DORSEY]; some were going to Pittsburgh; others, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] recalls, were going to enlist where they could.

When Lew. Wallace made his call Joseph Romiser had just received the letter which I hold in my hand and which has grown yellow after twenty-five years. Upon the envelope is the device of a man nailing our flag to the staff and the sentiment below is, "It shall yet float over Sumter." This letter tells how the writer had in response to Romiser's request just written to this man directing him to go to Pittsburgh to an address given that he might enlist in Captain Berrier's company of the Tenth Pennsylvania, as Romiser was about to do. I think Berrier now lives in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE]. He received this letter about the 14th of June and prepared to start.

On the 19th, when Lew. Wallace called for aid, this poor young man, with one hundred others, went from Frostburg, under Capt. Frank Mason, and hurried down the mountain to defend Cumberland, the county seat. Hither they came and fell into line. When our guard was driven back into the town they were on duty to repel the attack if it came. These green recruits in the evening, at the cars, brave but undisciplined, were ordered by Captain Mason to uncap their muskets, when Alpheus Beall, who was just behind this man, let his musket fall, and the musket, being thus discharged, inflicted this wound, sending an inch minie-ball through this man's head, passing in the manner I have described. As he fell he was caught in the arms of a comrade and carried into a private house. He lay in a critical condition for months, until finally life was assured.

Among the papers which your committee saw, although our President says they do not exist, are the photographs of the man who was thus shot and maimed in the line of duty defending his country. I hold them up before you that you may see the ravages of the minie-ball. I show you now the affidavits of the man whose musket shot him, of the men who picked him up. I show you the affidavit of Dr. Fundenberg, the surgeon, and abundant proofs beside, and this local history. Here, too, are the petitions of hundreds of good citizens of every pursuit and politics praying Congress to pension this deserving minute-man. But the Pension Office, according to the notes which I have here in my hand, found that although the man at the time he was wounded was doing good service in the line of duty, yet because he had hurried to defend the flag without waiting to be mustered they were "constrained"—that is the expression—to reject the application, although he carried the belt, cartridge-box, and musket into the ranks under Captain Mason, who was acting under command of a Union colonel from Indiana, who, I believe, is well known to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions as General Lew. Wallace, now famous—they were "constrained" to refuse a pension because he had never been mustered into the service.

This man was justly entitled to a pension because he was inspired by the spirit of the minute-men of Concord and Lexington—the "embattled farmers, who fired the shot heard round the world"—because he came from his mountain home, and standing in the ranks was shot nigh unto death. Because he was not mustered in, and therefore could not obtain a pension at the Pension Office under the strictness of the general pension law, he came to Congress. It is a case, of all cases, such as should come to Congress, so that the injustice done by the general law might be corrected by a special act. This having been passed by the unanimous action of both Houses, the President vetoes the bill because, as he says, this soldier, wounded in the line of duty, was not mustered in.

Now, whom are you going to follow? I put it to your conscience and your honor as American Representatives, as against your party zeal and party expediency. Perhaps I am firing at the wrong target; but if so, I am proud of my confidence in human nature; and I leave those who take the opposite view to support President Cleveland in this veto.

Mr. Speaker, time does not permit me to refer to all the precedents in this matter; but I have examined all that were accessible. I looked to see what Washington and other Presidents had done in like cases. Some of the minute-men of Concord and Lexington and the men who fought at Bunker Hill were not mustered in, yet they were pensioned by the Colonial Assembly of Massachusetts, and that action was adopted by the Congress of the United States at its very first session; and George Washington, unlike President Cleveland, did not veto the bill, but approved it. [Applause.]

I find further that when the time came to renew the right of those men to pensions, where they had been wounded in service and in the line of duty, but had never been mustered in, Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Democratic party, did not veto the bill, like President Cleveland, but approved it. [Applause.] I find also that Andrew Jackson, the great Democratic President and the brave defender of his country, had submitted to him bills pensioning members of some volunteer corps who had never been mustered into the service of the nation or State, but had done actual service and been wounded and disabled in the line of duty, and he had a chance to veto the measure, but he would not veto; he approved the bill. [Applause.] I find further in a case presented to Abraham Lincoln that when some red-tape clerk in some office had said that a man had not been mustered in, that grand old man said, "I want to know whether he served his country, and if his right is based upon service in the line of duty, I do not care about the muster-in." And Lincoln did not veto the bill. [Applause.]

I say to my friends here as men of honor and conscience, that from the foundation of this Government injury received in the line of duty, disability incurred in the service, has been regarded as the essential thing giving the right to a pension. It is the right of rights, the ground of grounds for a pension from this great nation as an evidence of its gratitude and its Americanism. If the men of this Congress can not rise, and perhaps they can not, above party feeling, and go with Washington, and Jackson, and Jefferson, and Lincoln, let them go with President Cleveland, and send away this poor soldier who never had a dollar of pay or bounty, who I fear had to bear the expense of his own medical attendance for months, who to-day carries the scars which he received and endures the suffering he incurred in the service of his country, who is deserted by his country because he was never mustered in. But I appeal to every man who thinks the founders of the Republic, ay, the fathers of the Democratic party, were instinct with the spirit of Concord and Lexington, who looks to the future of the Republic "when like our sires our sons are gone," to vote in favor of this minute-man of 1861, who on his way to be mustered in with the "boys in blue" received this grievous wound from the consequences of which he has ever since suffered in neglect because he was swift to fight for our flag. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the residue of my time.

APPENDIX.

[Senate. Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Report No. 1324.]

In the Senate of the United States. June 15, 1886. Ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1059:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1059) granting a pension to Joseph Romiser, have carefully examined the same and report favorably upon it for the reason set forth in the subjoined report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, which is as follows, as reported by Mr. SWOPE, of Pensylvania:

"The facts of this case, which are completely substantiated, are briefly as follows:

"The claimant was a member of Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, of Frostburg, Alleghany, County, Maryland. This company of volunteers was not mustered into either the United States or State service. On the 19th of June, 1861, claimant was with said company when they were ordered to proceed to Cumberland, Md., to repel a threatened attack of the confederate forces. Upon the arrival of the company in Cumberland the men were ordered to uncap their muskets. While doing this duty a musket in the hands of Alpheus Beall was accidentally discharged, and a minie-ball, with which it was charged, struck claimant in the left side of the neck, coming out near the left eye, entirely destroying the sight of his eye, the hearing of his left ear, and the 'hinge of his jaws.'

"Dr. George B. Tunfenburg testifies that he was one of the surgeons who professionally attended claimant. He found that a minie-ball had entered at the back part of the neck, passed along on the outside of the skull, under the ear, breaking the jaw at its ramus, and making its exit through the malar bone below and to the outer side of the eye of the same side. The wound was a dangerous one, but after a long sickness he recovered, but has lost the hearing of the injured ear and the sight of the eye. There is considerable deformity of the face, caused by exfoliation of the bone.

"The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau because 'claimant was not in the military service of the United States.' The Committee on Invalid Pensions have heretofore uniformly declined to recommend the granting of a pension to soldiers not enrolled in the service of the United States or acting under the immediate orders of an officer in the United States service. They are fully satisfied that this rule is the proper one, and that it should be rigidly adhered to; otherwise it will be readily seen that the door would be opened wide to a great number of claimants of whom it would be impossible to obtain any official record.

"It will be observed, however, that this man joined a military organization very early in the late war, and before the matter of enlistment and military organization was understood. June 19, 1861, he went with his company in obedience to orders to repel a threatened attack on Cumberland, and in the performance of this duty he received a serious wound, which imperiled his life at the time and has materially disabled him ever since.

"To properly understand the full bearing of this case it may be well to speculate as to what public opinion would have been and what would have been the result if, instead of springing to arms and going without hesitation when ordered to a threatened point, every volunteer would have hesitated or declined to march until he was regularly enlisted, enrolled, and mustered into the service of the United States.

"This case differs in all respects from those who, for one consideration or another and later on in the war, declined to enter the service of the United States, preferring organizations of a State or even local character.

"Your committee must content themselves with this brief statement of their views as to this particular case, and, by reason of the distinction attempted to be drawn between this and most other cases, they report the bill favorably and recommend its passage."

Mr. LONG. Move the bill pass, notwithstanding the veto. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I move the bill pass.

Mr. MATSON. We wish to be heard on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House agreed to by unanimous consent has not yet been executed.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask by unanimous consent to make that motion that the bill pass.

Mr. BRAGG. I object. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the order of the House. It is that thirty minutes be allowed for debate in opposition to the veto, and if required thirty minutes in support of it, and then the vote should be taken on referring the message to the committee. If that motion is not sustained the veto message will be before the House for action.

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes, sir.

I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN].

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Speaker, the present accidental and temporary occupant of the Executive Mansion, with unexampled effrontery and apparently boundless egotism, has taken it upon himself to set at naught the will of the people of this country, as expressed through their accredited representatives in Congress, by an unprecedented use, or rather abuse, of the veto power. For one, while I might differ with him in his judgment, no word would fall from my lips in condemnation had there been a legitimate exercise of this high prerogative. But in all these pension veto messages there is no word suggestive of the exercise of an unlawful or unconstitutional power upon the part of Congress, no intimation that it is contrary to the policy of this Government to pension its wounded and disease-stricken defenders, or the dependent parents, widows, and orphans of those who have given their lives for its preservation. But these screeds, purporting to emanate from the White House, but in reality coming from the Pension Office, are devoted to lecturing Congress upon the methods and rules which it has adopted for the conduct of its business; to deriding and slandering the maimed veterans of the war, and holding up to ridicule the wounds received by them in an honorable warfare, the result of which made it possible for him to break into the capital of the nation, but in which he lacked either the courage or the patriotism to engage except by proxy, and thus evading a duty which every able-bodied man owes his country in time of war; and to setting up his opinion upon mere questions of fact against the unanimous verdict of three hundred and twenty-five men in this House and seventy-six at the other end of the Capitol, each of them his peer in judgment, experience, and intelligence.

Instead of presenting to Congress some legal reasons why these pension bills should not receive his signature he treats us with samples of the attempts at vulgar wit of which he seems capable; he sneers at the services performed and the hardships endured by these worthy and patriotic men; he scandalizes the widows of those who are dead—died that he and such as he might live—maligns their chastity and questions the legitimacy of their children.

These so-called veto messages are not the utterances of a patriot or a statesman. They are not utterances that ought to come from the Chief Magistrate of sixty million of free and intelligent people when addressing their representatives. They are rather the arguments of a cheap pettifogger before an ignorant justice of the peace, intent on winning his case, at whatever cost of honor, truth, and integrity. But these are not his own work, though we read in his newspaper organs that he neglected to pay proper respect to the anniversary of our national independence and devoted the day to writing vetoes. He is willing to adopt the documents prepared for him by some clerk in the Pension Office, who simply reiterates his former opinion when he rejected the claim. In Senate Report No. 1424 of the present session, made upon these vetoed pension bills, I find the following:

The files of papers in these vetoed cases, which are now in possession of your committee, contain the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, under date of June 14, 1886, stating that he incloses enrolled bills as follows, enumerating one hundred and eighteen House bills and eleven Senate bills, and instructing the Commissioner of Pensions as follows:

"Please cause the same to be critically examined, and report to this Department whether, in your opinion, any objections to their approval are known to exist. In cases where objections exist they should be specifically set forth."

This indicates, of course, unmistakably that the President relies upon the Commissioner for his facts.

That same report, with great force and applicability, further says:

In every, or nearly every, vetoed case Congress, by the action of both Houses, has overruled the action of the Commissioner of Pensions. Thereupon the President calls upon the Commissioner, whose physical condition is well known, to sustain the action of his office, and he naturally does so to the best of his ability. It should not be forgotten that oftentimes the reports of the two Houses contain severe and deserved reprimand of the action of the Pension Office.

What a spectacle is this! God grant we may never see the like again! And we shall not. Not even the Empire State, with all its vast resources and capabilities, can produce another Grover Cleveland.

Now, why should the case under consideration be referred to any committee of this House, except it be to further delay action and carry out what seems to be the settled determination of the other side of the House that these vetoed pension cases shall not come to a vote in the House? By sending them to a committee we bury them.

We all know that the meetings of all our committees at this late day of the session are few and far between. We all know that a quorum of any of the committees can now be induced to attend a committee meeting with difficulty; and in this case certainly there can be no good reason for such reference. We can never find out any more about this case than we know now. Every fact has been developed and is absolutely undisputed. The material facts are as follows:

First. The claimant, Joseph Romiser, was, in the early part of 1861, a member of Capt. Frank Mason's company of volunteers, of Frostburg, Alleghany County, Maryland.

Second. At the time Mr. Romiser was wounded his company had not yet been mustered into the service of either the State or the United States, though its members were so mustered subsequently.

Third. On the 19th of June, 1861, claimant, with his said company, was ordered by the proper military authorities to proceed to Cumberland, Md., to repel a threatened attack of the confederate forces.

Fourth. Notwithstanding they had not been mustered in, the company made no such objections. The company marched as ordered, and claimant marched with it. The enemies of his country were approaching; that was enough for him. Later on in the war he might have learned that it was a credit for a major-general to refuse to obey orders and to refrain from marching when the sound of battle was heard, but he, a private soldier, had not then learned any such lesson. He has now learned, however, that the same man who can veto his little pension of $8 per month has signed the bill which gives the skulking major-general the annual pay of a colonel in the Army of the United States.

Fifth. On the arrival of the company at Cumberland the men were ordered to uncap their muskets, and while doing this a musket in the hands of a comrade was accidentally discharged, and the minie-ball with which it was charged struck the claimant on the left side of the neck, coming out near the left eye, entirely destroying the sight of his eye, the hearing of his left ear, and the "hinge of his jaws."

Sixth. The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau because "claimant was not in the military service of the United States."

Seventh. He was by this wound greatly disabled and disfigured, which disabilities will go with him to his grave.

Eighth. The veto message simply confirms that finding of the Pension Bureau.

These are all the material facts in the case, and they are undisputed. What good end can be attained by referring this veto message? Manifestly not any. Every member of this House is as ready to vote now as he ever will be. It is said in this case, as in many other special pension cases, that there is no law authorizing the pension. Granted for the sake of the argument that it is so; that constitutes no just ground for a veto. If these cases came within the purview of the general pension law there would then be no occasion for special acts and no such opportunity given the present administration to show its hatred of and visit its spleen upon the Union soldier. It may well be doubted whether, in view of the provisions of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, the ruling of the Pension Bureau in rejecting this claim was not erroneous; but we need not so find in order that Congress may have the power to grant this pension, nor do we go contrary to the policy of the Government in so doing, though "the man of destiny" may think so. Joseph Romiser actually performed the duty to which he was ordered, and received his wound in the line thereof.

A case involving a similar principle was at one time presented to President Lincoln. He wrote to the War Department as follows:

I remember nothing of this case. I desire that it shall be investigated, and that Captain Bowry be paid for the services actually rendered, if any. The Government can not afford to accept services and refuse payment for them.

A. LINCOLN.

The papers were returned to him with the statement that Captain Bowry had not been mustered into the service prior to February 6, 1862, the period for which pay was claimed being anterior thereto. Under date of August, 1862, President Lincoln replied to this "red-tape" suggestion as follows:

I did not ask for information as to whether this man has been mustered into the service. Have we accepted his actual services? If we have, let him be paid for them, unless there is positive law against it.

A. LINCOLN.

Grant that this claim does not come within the purview of the general pension laws, yet Congress has the right to grant it by special act, and we are not without precedent of even more recent date than those cited from the acts of Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson. H. R. 5154, of the present session, reads as follows:

An act granting a pension to Margaret A. Poland.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret A. Poland, widow of Alexander Poland, late of Leesburg, Loudoun County, State of Virginia, at the rate of $12 per month.

This bill has passed both Houses of Congress, and has received the approval of the reputed author of the veto message now under consideration. Alexander Poland, the husband of this pensioner, was never in either the military or civil service of the United States. He was a citizen of Virginia during the late war, and a loyal man. He furnished food and shelter to the troops of the United States. He was murdered by Mosby's band, doubtless because of his loyal sentiments. His widow has been pensioned the same as a soldier's widow. I do not object to this. I voted for the bill, and had it been vetoed should have cheerfully voted to pass it notwithstanding. I call attention to it to show the inconsistency of the acting President and his overreaching desire to veto the pensions of loyal soldiers.

I implore gentlemen on the other side of the House to for once rise above partisan prejudice. Refuse to refer this message. Pass the bill notwithstanding the veto, and pass it now. Demonstrate that the entire embodiment of all that is just and good in government does not reside at the other end of the Avenue, and thus partially at least remove the stigma of the past.

[During the delivery of the preceding speech, Mr. LYMAN'S time having expired, Mr. BURROWS yielded five minutes more, and at the conclusion of the remarks, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to extend in the RECORD.]

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that general consent be given to members to print remarks upon this pension case.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I have neither the time nor the patience to consider the general character of the messages of the President vetoing private pension bills. I have only this now to say, that the language employed in many of them is, to say the least, in exceeding bad taste. The spirit running through them all is anything but commendable. The flings at the Union soldier, the reflections upon his character, the imputations upon his veracity, the sneering at his disabilities, is unworthy the President of the United States and unbecoming the dignity of his great office. Who would have thought that in less than a quarter of a century after the close of the war the men who sought the destruction of the Republic would control its destinies? Who would have thought that the veteran soldiers would live to see the time when the disabilities they contracted on the field and in prison to rescue an imperiled nation would no longer be the subject of honorable mention, but rather a theme for public ridicule? Veterans, conceal your disabilities! Cover up your scars! They are offensive to this Democratic administration!

But I desire to address myself only to the pending proposition. I shall question the judgment, conscience, and heart of the Democratic majority of this House if this bill is not immediately considered and passed over the Executive veto. There is no question of fact in the case about which there is the slightest dispute. There is no occasion for delay—the issue is made up. The claimant in this case was wounded by a bullet entering the head back of the ear and coming out at the eye, destroying his hearing in one ear and the sight of one eye, and it is established by expert medical testimony that he will become by reason of this injury totally blind. These facts are conceded. But the claim was rejected by the Pension Office solely upon the ground that the soldier at the time he received the injury had not been mustered into the military service of the United States, and the President echoes this decision in his veto message, and for the same reason withholds his approval of the act placing this soldier on the pension-roll. The Pension Office could not, under the law, admit this claim, and the Congress of the United States is the only tribunal where the claimant can now be heard. The gentleman from Maryland has recited in detail the circumstances under which the injury was received. How the claimant in the hour of his country's peril rushed to her defense, and in the discharge of a patriotic duty received this distressing injury. You have all the facts before you, and yet it is proposed to refer this bill and the veto accompanying it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for the purpose of determining what? Any disputed fact? Not one. The only question for this House to pass judgment upon is whether it will under the admitted circumstances give this claimant a pension, though he was not sworn and mustered into the military service of the United States at the time of the injury. Can any one assign a valid reason for not determining that question now? I submit it is not out of the usual course for the Congress to immediately pass upon an executive veto. I call to mind a recent precedent in favor of such action. The last notorious case was the message of President Arthur vetoing the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter in the last Congress, which upon being read was immediately considered by the House without reference to any committee. Will you deny this patriotic soldier what you granted Fitz John Porter?

The simple question then is, will you refuse to put this soldier on the pension-roll because at the time he was shot he had not been mustered into the military service of the United States? But he was in fact in the military service. True, he had not possibly taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, but he was supporting it. [Applause.] True, he had not with uplifted hand taken an oath to defend his country's flag against all enemies, foreign or domestic, but he was defending it against a domestic enemy seeking to dishonor and destroy it. [Applause.] I submit to you that the citizen even who with lofty courage and patriotism goes to the defense of his country and imperils his life is entitled to the same consideration as he who is oath-bound to his country's service.

I submit that the man who in the hour of the nation's peril, without waiting for muster, without stopping to take upon himself an oath to defend the Constitution and the flag, did defend them, and is maimed for life, is entitled to as much consideration at the hands of his country as those who, oath-bound to defend the Constitution, proved recreant to their plighted faith. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I appeal now to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to allow us to have a direct vote. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNN in the chair). The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCOMAS. But I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that we may have a vote on the main question now on this bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate on that side of the House has expired. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. MATSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill now, but shall vote to refer it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as I have voted to refer other bills; but will say in doing so that I believe this to be a meritorious case, and to be in the line of all the precedents from 1785 down to this date. But a good reason for referring it has been given by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who in the statement he has made of the case has shown that in all these cases we need to know more definitely the facts. The gentleman's statement is rather against than for the claimant, while I think the facts are the other way.

As I understand the case, this soldier was in the military service and in the line of duty. He probably had taken the oath also, but was not regularly mustered in by a duly authorized mustering officer. It is due, however, to say in this connection, as is admitted, I believe, by the gentleman from Maryland, that certain papers containing important facts in this case were not before the President when his veto message was written. If the case is as stated, and I believe it to be substantially correct, I have no doubt in the world that this committee will very quickly report it back and we shall be permitted to vote upon it on its merits; but I shall vote to send it to the committee first, as I did the case referred to by my colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR], which I believe also to be a meritorious case, and which, if the committee finds the facts to be as stated, I shall vote for when it comes before the House on the question of its passage.

Another case voted upon the other day—the case of Harrington—there was a special reason for sending to the committee. The case turns entirely on a single question of fact, and that question of fact was not made clear either by the report or the statements to the House. The fact important to know is, was the soldier who received the injury himself at fault? Did he provoke the assault upon him in the barracks? Was he in a quarrel in which he was himself to blame? If he was, then he is not entitled to a pension. If, on the other hand, the assault was unprovoked, then he would be. That question of fact ought to be determined by the committee before the bill is reported back, and if the facts are as seems to be assumed in the veto message, then the President is right and the veto should be sustained, but if the facts are otherwise I shall not hesitate to vote for the bill, and so far as I am concerned I desire that there shall be no misunderstanding, and I believe in saying what I shall say I reflect the honest sentiment of impartial Democrats and Republicans alike, and certainly of the true soldiers of the Union Army, and that is, that every soldier who was disabled by wounds, injuries, or otherwise in the service in the line of duty is entitled to a pension just as much as he was entitled to the pay he received, for pension in that case is but deferred pay. But it rests upon that ground and no other. Anything beyond that is a gratuity.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes, sir, if it does not come out of my time, which is limited.

Mr. LONG. In this case what fact is there that requires that it should be sent to the committee?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In this case I know of none. But I am sure the bill will be reported back. If not, I will vote to discharge the committee, and bring it here and pass it.

Mr. LONG. Having been reported unanimously once by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, what is the use of referring it to them again?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have given my reasons, and the gentleman gives his. I think all these bills should take the same course.

It should not be forgotten either in this connection that nearly all of these vetoed claims have been rejected by one or more Republican Commissioners of Pensions as well as by the present Commissioner.

A number of bills, however, have been vetoed because pensions have been granted in the Pension Office. That shows how carefully some of these bills were considered in the House.

I wish now to refer to two cases which I hold in my hand, from which the President has seen fit, rightly I think, to withhold his approval. Let us look at them. On examining them I am astonished that they could ever have passed this House and the other body of Congress—astonished that they should ever have been reported favorably from a committee of either House.

Here is one of them. If the facts stated be true, and if they are not this committee can so determine, here is a man who, with a band organized for that purpose, was engaged in plundering and robbing unprotected persons, and was injured while so engaged. And yet by this bill, which the President has vetoed, he is granted a pension for it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope I may have five minutes more.

Mr. MATSON. I can only yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Is that this case?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is one of those which have been referred to the committee.

Another case is where a claimant for a pension is reported in the records as having twice deserted, and it appears that his disability was incurred while attempting to escape from the guards for the purpose of desertion the third time; and yet it is proposed to give this man a pension—to put him on the pension-roll by the side of men honorably discharged, by the side of men wounded in battle, in the face of the enemy in this country, as equally entitled to honor. Has it come to this, that henceforth the deserter and the coward are to be equally honored and equally rewarded with the soldier disabled in the service and honorably discharged?

If my time permits I wish to refer to a memorable incident in history—one of the grandest which the annals of recorded time have handed down to us. At the memorable battle of Thermopylæ two soldiers were temporarily absent when the band of three hundred Spartans were called upon to die with their leader in defending the narrow pass against the invading horde of Xerxes. One of them, though nearly blind, apprised that the fatal hour of his comrades had come, asked to be led into the ranks, that he might die with the rest of the band in the defense of his country. The other returned to Sparta, the only survivor of this heroic band; but he returned only to be dishonored.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Has either any application to this case?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think they show the change in the times. Sparta embalmed in everlasting remembrance the name of the hero who, though almost blind, refused to leave when he might have done so, by placing it conspicuously on the column erected to the memory of the three hundred whose lives saved their country, and consigned his comrade who returned to lasting disgrace, while here a howl is set up because the President has thought it proper to withhold his signature from a bill proposing to grant a pension to one who twice deserted and was hurt in the act of deserting a third time.

It shows, I say, the degeneracy of the times. If these men lived now, Eurytus, who asked to be led into the ranks that he might die by the side of his comrades in the defense of his country, would be forgotten, while Aristodemus, who left his comrades to return in safety to his home, would be given a pension. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that true patriotism has departed from among us. I do not believe the time has come for putting deserters on the pension-rolls. It is not the demand of honorable soldiers, and I say the President has done good service in calling in this emphatic way the attention of the country to bills of this character. He may in some cases have been mistaken. I think he has been, but in such bills as these he is right and the country will sustain him, and honest soldiers will sustain him in spite of demagogues here or elsewhere.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MATSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. SOWDEN. Article I, section 7, of the Constitution provides that every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here we have a President who has the patriotism and manly courage to exercise, under this provision of the Constitution, his right to veto such private pension bills as he may deem unjust and unwarranted by the facts upon which they are founded, and the other side of this House are making a vain attempt to hold up to public ridicule this patriotic and courageous public official because of his fearless exercise of this constitutional prerogative. It is a fearful mistake. The intervention of the veto power is in many cases the only safeguard of the people against unjust and extravagant legislation. The people will always honor and respect a President for a rightful exercise of this constitutional power to prevent hasty, extravagant, and dangerous legislation unauthorized by the Constitution. The other side of the House commit a grievous blunder when they attempt to make the discussion of these vetoes a party question. They can make no political capital out of this matter.

The soldiers and the country fully understand this subject. Let every veto submitted by the President stand upon its own merits. As certain as you make the question of a reconsideration of these vetoes a political one, injustice must be the inevitable result to all parties concerned. The soldiers and the country will justly hold the other side of the House responsible for having precipitated this unrighteous discussion.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] deserves the thanks of this House for adhering so closely in his remarks to the merits involved in the case now pending before this body on a motion of reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. He evidently appreciates the situation and deprecates these unwarranted assaults upon the President lest they might prove fatal to the Marylander's case in which he takes such a warm and creditable interest.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] on Wednesday last, when this same subject was under discussion, took occasion to say, among other things, this—I quote from page 6626 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> We were told that this great and good President, who vetoes pension bills by the score, meant right. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I suspect he does mean right in the sense of attempting to please certain elements of the country; but he does not mean right in the eyes of the generous and loyal people of this land. I desire to say, sir, that the President means exactly what his vetoes show. His vetoes, by their substance, language, tone, and temper, can have no other construction than that he dislikes all pension legislation, and I do not think that he will thank gentlemen for intimating that he is only trying to save, at best, the poor little pittance of money that is in controversy in granting these pensions. No, sir; that is not what he means. These vetoes are intended for the approval of a portion of the people of this country, and I desire to say that they unquestionably meet their approval.

What does the gentleman mean? His language is incomprehensible; he speaks so enigmatically. The President's vetoes mean exactly what they purport upon their face, and nothing else. It is absurd for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] to say that the President's vetoes can have no other construction than that he dislikes all pension legislation. If he will refer to page 6639 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he will discover that this same President, who sifts out the chaff from the wheat in these private pension bills approved one hundred and eighteen of them in one batch. Would it seem from this that he disliked all pension legislation? We passed some six hundred and sixty-five private pension bills during this session of Congress, and five hundred and seventy-five have become laws; so that out of this very extraordinary large number the President only vetoed ninety.

He also approved of the general law passed by this Congress increasing the widows' pensions from $8 to $12 per month. Does this look as if the President was the enemy of this class of legislation that you gentlemen on the other side are attempting to make him out? Read the President's veto message in the case of Aretus F. Loomis, on page 6623 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and see whether he is not more mindful of the interest of the honest soldier's claim for pension than some of you gentlemen on the other side are willing to give him credit for. This message reads as follows:

> I herewith return without approval House bill No. 7018, entitled "An act granting a pension to Aretus F. Loomis." The Commissioner of Pensions, before he became aware of the passage of this bill, directed favorable action upon the application of the claimant pending in the Pension Bureau. A certificate has been issued for the payment of a pension to him, dating from September 30, 1882. In the interest of the claimant I therefore withhold my signature from the bill, as the pension granted by special act would only date from the time of its passage.
> GROVER CLEVELAND.
> EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 5, 1886.

What do you gentlemen on the other side have to say about the merits of this veto message? Does not the President show a most remarkably keen and delicate appreciation of the soldier's interest in this case? Gentlemen, please don't all speak at once! I wonder whose approval the President sought when he vetoed this bill? Perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] can tell us. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] mean when he says, in his remarks on page 6626 of the RECORD:

> If you propose to get a pension for one soldier by intimating that it is the only worthy one, that all or many of the others vetoed may not be worthy, then I can not go with you. This is what I call benefiting one at the expense of the many.

Here he speaks in enigmas again, unless he would make no discrimination in the granting of pensions. Does he mean to say that he would pension deserters and faithless and dishonest soldiers who were injured while engaged in the commission of robberies and other unlawful depredations? While his language would import this, I can scarcely believe that the gentleman would be willing to make this discrimination against the honest and brave soldier who was injured in the line of duty or contracted a fatal disease while serving his country honestly and faithfully.

This question of pensions is entirely too sacred to be made dependent upon any one political party. No patriot or friend of the soldier will endeavor to make political capital out of it. It is to be lamented that there are some gentlemen upon this floor who have no hesitancy in doing so. Let us contrast the record of the Republican party with that of the Democratic party in the matter of private pension bills. During this session of Congress five hundred and seventy-five private pension bills have become laws, while under General Grant's administration of eight years only five hundred and forty-two similar bills were enacted, and in the Forty-seventh Congress, which was Republican, but one hundred and ninety-six special acts granting pensions were passed.

Under General Black's administration of the Pension Office 82,977 pension certificates were issued from March 17, 1885, to March 17, 1886, while 74,069 were issued under Commissioner Dudley's administration of the office from March 17, 1884, to March 17, 1885, or 8,908 more under a Democratic administration of the office than under Republican management. What have the honest and deserving soldiers of the country to say about this? Does this look as if the Democratic party was unfriendly to the pensioning of the soldiers and their legal representatives who are entitled to pensions? Oh, no, gentlemen; you can not make any capital out of this business. It is amusing to hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN]. He seems to think that the chastity of the members of this body, as well as that of the seventy-six distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, is involved in the veto messages of the President; and he speaks derisively of the President's course in this particular, and denounces as "unparalleled egotism" the President's fearless exercise of his constitutional right to interpose the veto power when he finds that a measure has no merit and ought not to become a law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MATSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allowed me I shall not undertake to discuss the special merits of the pending bill, except to state that the first veto of this application for pension was made by Mr. Dudley while he was Commissioner of Pensions. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber have taken advantage of this debate to arraign the Democratic party and the President before the country as being unfriendly to pensioners. Nothing could be further from the truth. I hold in my hand a statement which I have compiled from the Statutes at Large which shows the number of private pension bills that have been passed since 1869. This statement shows that during the eight years when General Grant was President of the United States there were passed five hundred and forty-two bills granting pensions to soldiers in special cases.

Mr. BURROWS. How many of them were vetoed?

Mr. SPRINGER. None, I believe, were vetoed; but President Grant vetoed a bill equalizing bounties that provided millions of dollars for the soldiers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield; my time is too limited; but the fact is as I have stated it. During the Forty-fifth Congress there were 238 of these special pension bills passed; during the Forty-sixth Congress there were 97; during the Forty-seventh Congress there were 151; during the Forty-eighth Congress there were 552.

A day or two ago the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the Forty-seventh Congress, prayed the Almighty to have mercy upon the soul of a man who could veto such a bill as was then before the House. I ask the pensioners of the country whether they can forgive the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] for having secured the passage through Congress of only one hundred and fifty-one of these special pension bills during the two years he was chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when they see that the other gentleman from Indiana on this side of the House [Mr. MATSON], who is now chairman of that committee and was in the last Congress, secured the passage in that Congress of five hundred and fifty-two such bills? Five hundred and fifty-two of these special pension bills were passed through the Forty-eighth Congress when my honored Democratic friend from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] was chairman of the committee, as against one hundred and fifty-one passed during the Congress when the gentleman from Indiana on the other side [Mr. BROWNE] was chairman of the committee, and when both Houses of Congress were Republican and the President also.

During this Congress there have been passed and become laws up to this time five hundred and seventy-five pension bills, twenty-five or thirty more than were passed during the entire eight years of the administration of General Grant. Yet gentlemen on the other side endeavor to show that the Democratic party is unfriendly to the soldier because President Cleveland, in the exercise of his constitutional right and duty, has seen fit to veto about ninety other pension bills which have passed.

Mr. Speaker, the further statement is made that the record of the Democratic party shows unfriendliness to pensions. I call attention to the fact that during the fiscal year just closed the administration of the Pension Office under General Black has caused payments to pensioners to be made to the amount of $8,600,000 in excess of those made during the previous fiscal year. This is the record that the Democratic Commissioner of Pensions has made during the first fiscal year of his official term.

In addition to that, I have received from the Treasurer of the United States the following statement of the aggregate receipts and expenditures of the General Government from all sources during the fiscal years 1885 and 1886, showing that, including pensions, the Democrats have secured a net reduction of $16,000,000 in the expenses of the Government; and, exclusive of pensions, a reduction of $24,000,000 has been secured during the first year of Democratic administration:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, July 7, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of yesterday I beg to transmit herewith a comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1885 and 1886.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN, Treasurer United States.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives.

It is considered an expenditure when the Treasurer issues his draft in payment of the warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the repayment at the end of the fiscal year of the unexpended balances.

Mr. Speaker, it further appears that since Commissioner Black assumed charge of the Pension Office he issued to pensioners certificates to the number of 102,280, being 10 per cent. more than the number issued by his predecessor during a like period of time, when the total number issued was 94,705. The following are the figures in detail:

Number of certificates issued from March 17, 1884, to May 31, 1885.

Total	102,178

Total	102,280

The number of original pension certificates issued during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, was 34,192. The number issued from July 1, 1884, to March 16, 1885, inclusive, was 19,864; from March 17, 1885, the time General Black took charge of the office, to June 30, 1886, there have been issued 56,758 original pension certificates. The number issued during the fiscal year just closed being 40,852, the total number of certificates of every description issued during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, is 81,422, and the amount paid out during said year on account of pensions is $65,747,380.

All these facts I cite for the purpose of demonstrating conclusively that the Democratic party of the country has convincingly shown its desire to relieve the necessities of the pensioners. When I came to Congress twelve years ago the pension-roll aggregated about $39,000,000 a year. It now aggregates $65,000,000 annually. And I may be permitted to state that I have voted for every bill which contributed to this increase of the pension expenditures of the country.

Mr. Speaker, on several occasions in the House this session gentlemen upon the other side have taken occasion to attack the administration of the Pension Office under the management of General Black. These attacks have been inspired from the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report for the year ending June 30, 1885, took occasion to refer to the past management of the Pension Office. He made the following statement in his report, to which exception has been taken, namely:

> At one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents of a single organization, who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required, in addition to service in the field, submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted. Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied; and the vast machinery of a professed governmental office became a party power. The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so not openly but surely. People of one faith filled every one of the great agencies. Examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the land as recruiting sergeants for a party.

The statements contained in this extract from his report have been persistently denied upon the other side of the House and in the other end of the Capitol. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen have overlooked a table which is contained in a report of the Commissioner of Pensions, published on page 54. This paper shows the number of applicants for pensions examined by the examining surgeons of the Pension Office in the various States of the Union during the calendar year 1884 and the amount of fees which were received in the aggregate therefor. I desire to call special attention to this table, showing where the work of the Pension Office was concentrated during the year of the last Presidential election. Take the State of Maine, in the extreme northeast part of the country, for instance. In that State there were thirty-one hundred and nineteen persons examined by medical examining boards during that fiscal year, and for these examinations fees were paid to the amount of nearly $18,000.

As there are but four Congressional districts in that State, this was an average of 779 pension applicants examined in each Congressional district in that State during that year. That was a contested State politically, and great exertions were made to allow as many pensions as possible there. Take Massachusetts, a State adjoining it, which it was conceded from the beginning that the Republicans would carry, and where no special efforts were required to secure this end. The number of persons examined by medical boards was but 3,489 and the fees allowed were but $20,000. As there are twelve Congressional districts in that State, the average number examined in each Congressional district was but 291. From this it will appear that in Massachusetts, reliably Republican, there were but 291 applicants whose cases were sent to medical examining boards during the Presidential year, while in Maine, which was doubtful and required great efforts to carry it, there were 779 applicants for pensions in each district whose cases were considered.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What year was that?

Mr. SPRINGER. Eighteen hundred and eighty-four, the Presidential year.

Now, let us go farther West. Take the great State of Ohio, in which there was a spirited contest for political supremacy. In that State there were 12,721 applicants for pensions whose cases went before medical boards, and for which fees to the amount of $73,700 were paid during the Presidential year. This was an average of 605 cases for each Congressional district. But in Pennsylvania, which was reliably Republican and where no special efforts were required to carry it for the party, there were but 9,297 applicants whose cases were examined, and the fees to examiners amounted to but $53,000. As there are twenty-eight Congressional districts in Pennsylvania, the average number of applicants examined in each district of that State was only 332, only about half as many as in each Congressional district of Ohio during the same year.

But let us take another contested State, the State of Indiana. In that State where the contest was severe and the most stupendous efforts made by the Republicans to secure supremacy there were 10,680 applicants for pension whose cases were considered by medical boards, and for which service the Government paid fees to the amount of $62,000. As there are thirteen districts in Indiana, the average for each Congressional district was 821 cases. In Illinois, which was reliably Republican and lying on the very borders of the State of Indiana, there were but 9,232 applicants for pension whose cases were considered during the Presidential year. As there are twenty Congressional districts in that State, the average for each district was but 460, only about half as many to each district as were examined during the same time in the State of Indiana.

Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, that these cases to which I have called attention were the result of accident? Certainly not. They were the result of design and they demonstrate conclusively the truth of every statement made by General Black in his report, namely, that the whole power of the Pension Office was turned to the political advantage of the Republican party. Why, what other reason could there be for examining twice as many cases in each Congressional district in Maine as in Massachusetts, twice as many in Ohio as in Pennsylvania, and twice as many in Indiana as in Illinois, than that of using the machinery of the Pension Office for political purposes? The soldiers in the State of Illinois had just as much right to have their cases considered as did the soldiers in Indiana, and so of the soldiers in Pennsylvania as compared with those in Ohio, and in Massachusetts as compared with those in Maine; but for political reasons and for the sake of using the machinery of the Pension Office to secure votes for the Republican party, twice as many cases were called up and passed upon in each Congressional district in doubtful Republican States as were called up in States that were reliably Republican and where no special efforts were required.

The vast amount of fees that were paid to pension examining surgeons themselves must have had great influence in aiding the cause of the Republican party in the States to which I have called attention. These examining boards were all partisans of the Republican party, and it appears that in Indiana $62,000 were distributed to such agents of the Republican party during the Presidential year, and in Maine nearly $18,000, and in Ohio $73,000. This perversion of the business of the Pension Office for political purposes was the result of a premeditated and preconcerted design on the part of the Republican leaders, and was done in the interest of the Republican party, and to secure the election of the Republican candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States. For this conspiracy against the soldiers of the country in other States than doubtful Republican States, who had as much right to have their cases considered as did the soldiers in the doubtful Republican States, for this refusal to consider their cases equally with others the Republican party of the country is responsible; and for this outrage upon the pensioners of the whole country they must be held responsible before the bar of public judgment.

Mr. MATSON. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. MATSON. I will try and not occupy the whole of that time, by being as brief as possible.

I address myself to the precise point here at issue. The precise question is, shall this bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions? I insist, Mr. Speaker, it is in the interest of this bill that it shall go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I think I know an attempt at this time to pass this bill without reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions would result in a vote on the part of the House to sustain the veto of the President. Why? Because there are gentlemen on this side of the House who would not be satisfied without consideration of the veto message of the President by the committee of the House. They have placed themselves in that position heretofore on all the bills which have been pressed on the House as to vetoes of the President. My judgment is, there are enough of those gentlemen who are not satisfied to act without consideration by the committee to sustain the President's vetoes. Believing that to be the fact, I think it is in the interest of the bill it should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

I wish to say further that I am in favor of this bill. I believe it is right. I believe this man should be pensioned, and so believing I am not afraid to say so here or elsewhere, because I believe the President is wrong, and when I have made up my mind to that fact I am ready to say so. But there are a great many members in this House who are not convinced, and will not be convinced until the message has been considered by some committee of the House. I do not say necessarily it should be considered by some committee, but they have placed themselves in the position of saying these bills should be considered in connection with veto messages of the President. When that has been done they are then ready to vote on them.

I wish to say to my friend from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] this bill should be reported at the earliest possible day. I have already said to him, the gentleman who originally reported it, Dr. SWOPE, of Pennsylvania, being absent, I will at once as chairman of that committee place it in the hands of any member he wishes, so it may be brought to the attention of the committee just so soon as the committee meets. So there is no need of taking this bill out of the original line of procedure by referring the bill and veto message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

I wish to add that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is not disposed to smother any gentleman's bill. If we believe the bill should not be passed over the President's veto we are not so apt to bring it back, and we may not bring it back at all. I do not know when we will be able to take up any particular bill, as we have some forty or fifty now pending before the committee.

Mr. McCOMAS. We will not take up much time in this case. The facts are undisputed. You had the papers and the President did not get them. Is not that a case which should not go back to the committee?

Mr. MATSON. So far as I am concerned I am satisfied, but I can not satisfy gentlemen on this side of the House they are wrong in taking the position they do, that these bills should be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for consideration in connection with the veto messages. I am not going to quarrel with them. It carries with it due respect to the Executive. Having taken that position, I feel there is enough of them to sustain the veto if the vote be pressed.

More than that, Mr. Speaker, there are other bills now pressing which should be considered, having been reported back from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, whether they shall be carried over the veto or not. I now insist on a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on referring the bill and accompanying veto message to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to ask a parliamentary question. If the motion to refer be voted down will the bill come before the House for passage notwithstanding the President's veto?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to refer is voted down the bill will come before the House for consideration. The question now is on the motion to refer to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 87.

Mr. McCOMAS. On the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, there will be an early report on this bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Unless the yeas and nays are called for, the ayes have it.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCOMAS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. MATSON. I have said all I could on that subject.

Mr. McCOMAS. On that assurance, that this bill will be reported back at once, I ask gentlemen on this side of the House not to insist on the yeas and nays. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 118, not voting 74; as follows:

A message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved a House joint resolution and bills of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 185) providing for the printing of eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Joseph Rankin;

V. J. FAGIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from V. J. Fagin, accountant of the Coast Survey Bureau, relative to an increase of his compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MILITARY STATION, LAKE MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report by a board of Army officers upon the gift to the United States of a site on Lake Michigan for military purposes by the Commercial Club of Chicago and recommending its acceptance by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1800) to secure to the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands under the act of March 3, 1883; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of the third annual report of the Civil Service Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

RETURN OF A BILL FROM THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1526) amending sections 4756 and 4757 of the Revised Statutes, relating to pensions to certain disabled persons who have served in the Navy or Marine Corps, in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'FERRALL, for ten days from to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, until Monday next.

To Mr. BEACH, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Also, a message from the Senate requesting the return of the bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these requests will be complied with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE WILLIAM H. COLE.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell; and
A bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On last Friday evening the Committee of the Whole House, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 325) granting a pension to Catharine Waters, agreed the bill might be reported to the House with a recommendation that a vote be taken in a full House immediately after the reading of the Journal to-day, with ten minutes allowed for debate on each side. Is it in order for me to call up that bill now?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Committee of the Whole can not make an agreement which can bind the House. Besides, there are two orders made by the House itself, assigning two bills especially for to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I ask that by unanimous consent the bill I have indicated be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be disposed of.

Mr. OATES. I object.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer a resolution to amend the rules, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the seventh subdivision of Rule XIV be amended by adding to the word "ballots," in the sixth line of said subdivision, the following:

"Nor shall any clerk, or any one employed at the Clerk's desk, or in any capacity in the House, communicate to any one, during the pendency of a call of the ayes and noes, any information as to the state of the vote or how any member of the House is recorded as having voted."

Also add, at the beginning of line 5 of said subdivision, the words "or approach."

The SPEAKER. Under the rules this resolution will lie over for one day, unless it be referred.

VETO MESSAGE—CARTER W. TILLER.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a privileged matter. The consideration of a bill vetoed by the President—a bill (H. R. 4002) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller—was on Tuesday postponed by a vote of the House till to-day. Since that was done the case has been opened in the Pension Department, and is now pending. I ask unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of that bill for one week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TAULBEE. Reserving the right to object——

Several members objected.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of this matter till next Friday, and upon that I call the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 99, noes 46.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone until next Friday was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] a question, whether the case has been made special in the Pension Office?

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to address that question to my colleague.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Another gentleman has asked unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I wish to know if the case of Tiller has been made special in the Pension Office?

Mr. WILLIS. I can not say as to that. The case has been reopened. Only two simple points are involved, and I think all the evidence on both points can be obtained between now and next Friday. It is in the interest of the case that I have asked a postponement.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Has the President withdrawn the charge of desertion?

Mr. WILLIS. That has been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that he be allowed to make a statement?

Objection was made.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to know if the motion to postpone fixed a day definite.

The SPEAKER. It did; and besides that it is a privileged matter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to take up and put on its passage the bill (S. 1886) in regard to certain pensions?

The SPEAKER. It is always in order to ask unanimous consent unless the regular order is demanded. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to exercise my privilege to ask unanimous consent for the purpose I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has distinctly stated it was in order to ask unanimous consent unless the regular order was demanded. The regular order has been demanded. By order of the House two bills have been postponed and made special orders for this morning. The Clerk will report the title of the first of those bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5194) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNES. I move to postpone the consideration of that bill until next Friday, all rights being retained.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With that understanding, representing the bill, I consent to the postponement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution, which was also by special order fixed for consideration to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

Mr. BURNES. I make the same motion with regard to the postponement of that joint resolution.

Mr. OATES. This resolution has been postponed seven times and stands on the Calendar with a favorable report from the Committee of the Whole. There is nothing for us to do but to take it up and vote on it, and I trust this House will in justice not postpone it any further, but will now dispose of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the joint resolution will be postponed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURNES, the Speaker stated the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. OATES. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 119, noes 14.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. OATES. On the assurance of gentlemen that they will aid me in getting the joint resolution disposed of next Friday, I withdraw the point as to a quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Such assurances only bind those who give them.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with private business for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

POLAR EXPEDITION TO LADY FRANKLIN BAY.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report.

Mr. SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 17, 1886.

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 4,500 copies, with the necessary illustrations, be printed of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer; 1,250 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,250 for the use of the House of Representatives."

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution for printing the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, by Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

E. BARKSDALE,
JAMES W. REID,
JOHN M. FARQUHAR,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES MANDERSON,
JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following is the statement accompanying the report of the committee of conference.

Explanations of the report of the committee of conference on the report of Lieutenant Greely:

Amendment 1: The House had voted for its own use 3,250 copies. By the Senate amendment agreed to by the committee of conference this number is reduced to 2,500 copies—twice the number given to the Senate, which has 1,250.

Amendment 2: By the Senate amendment agreed to by the committee of conference there are 750 copies ordered for the use of the Signal Office. These will be distributed among the public libraries of Europe and other arctic explorers.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned the day before yesterday the matter under consideration was the general deficiency appropriation bill, and the House was voting upon the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole——

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to say he desires to present a privileged report.

MARY NORMAN.

Mr. O'HARA. Yes, sir. It is the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bill (H. R. 6192) granting a pension to Mary Norman, with the President's objections thereto. I ask that the report be printed, and that it lie over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MATSON. I ask leave to file the views of the minority on that case.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[H. R. 6192. Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act granting a pension to Mary Norman.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Norman, widow of Corporal Turner Norman, late of Company G, Thirty-fifth United States Colored Troops.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

GRANTING A PENSION TO MARY NORMAN.

Mr. O'HARA, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred H. R. 6192, "granting a pension to Mary Norman," with the President's objection thereto, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The facts in this case are substantially as follows:

The claimant, Mary Norman, is the widow of Turner Norman, late corporal Company G, Thirty-fifth United States Colored Troops, enrolled May 22, 1863, and who was wounded in battle at Olustee, Fla., February 20, 1864.

War Department records show soldier in hospital from said wound from February 22, 1864, to August, 1864; left with detachment at Jacksonville, Fla., sick since November 26, 1864; present for duty from February 28, 1865, to April 30, 1866.

Soldier was mustered out of service with his company at Charleston, S. C., June 1, 1866. Company was in action at battle of Olustee, Fla., February 20, 1864. Company or regimental records do not give the location of wound.

Surgeon-General's report shows that soldier was treated in general hospital at Jacksonville, Fla., for gunshot wound of head received in battle; also in general hospital at Beaufort, S. C., for gunshot wound of left side of head.

Soldier died December 22, 1869.

Soldier made application for a pension, but died before the same was granted.

Widow filed application for pension February 4, 1880. Rejected on the ground that the death cause, "drowning," was not due to the soldier's military service.

A number of soldier's comrades testify under oath that, although his right jaw-bone was broken, resulting in a running sore, producing great suffering and partial deafness, soldier, after his return from hospital, refused to leave his regiment, but remained, doing light duty, until his regiment was mustered out at the close of the war.

After his discharge he was a great sufferer, and to a great extent unable to perform manual labor.

Soldier was drowned in an accident while crossing the Roanoke River in North Carolina, the indirect result of the wound received while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. In crossing said river the boat sprang a leak; the ferryman called to him to save himself; a man who was also in the boat with soldier made his escape, but soldier, suffering from his wound and disabilities received in the service, was unable properly to care for himself, and was drowned as the boat sank. Soldier's widow is quite poor.

The President's objections are as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 6192, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mary Norman."

The husband of this claimant was enrolled May 22, 1863, and was mustered out of the service June 1, 1866.

He was wounded in the head February 20, 1864; was treated for the same, and returned to duty September 3, 1864.

In her declaration for pension, filed in February, 1880, the claimant claims a pension because of his wound and deafness consequent therefrom, and that he died after he left the service.

In a letter, however, dated October 13, 1880, she states that her husband was drowned while trying to cross Roanoke River in December, 1868.

Her claim was rejected in 1881 on the ground that the cause of the soldier's death was accidental drowning, and was not due to his military service.

In an attempt to meet this objection it was claimed as lately as 1885, on behalf of the widow, that her husband's wound caused deafness to such an extent that at the time he was drowned he was unable to hear the ferryman, with whom he was crossing the river, call out that the boat was sinking.

How he could have saved his life if he had heard the warning is not stated.

It seems very clear to me that this is not a proper case for the granting of a pension.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 23, 1886.

The President in his objection to this bill adheres to the rulings of the Pension Office, holding that as it is not positively shown that soldier's death was the immediate cause of his Army service, therefore his widow, who is poor and destitute, with four small children, should receive no aid from the Government in whose defense he was wounded. It will not require a stretch of the imagination to see that a man who has suffered for years with a wound in the head would not be able in the time of peril and danger to act with the same degree of promptness and effectiveness as a person not so disabled, and we are still of the opinion that had it not have been for soldier's wound in the head, received, not in the tent or on dress parade, but in one of the most spirited contests during the war, he would have been in all human probability better able to protect and save himself at the time of his drowning.

That the widow did not file a claim for a pension until 1880 ought not to be taken as against her and to the prejudice of her rights. She states upon oath that at the time of her husband's death she had four small children dependent upon her for support; that on account of her poverty she was unable to raise the money necessary to fee an agent to prosecute her claim, and therefore her application was not made at an earlier date.

This fact should, in our opinion, entitle her to a most favorable consideration of her claim.

Her husband's military record, as far as any record had been kept, may be gathered from the following letters from the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 24, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your request of May 13, 1880, for certain information for use in consideration of application for pension No. 259615, and to return it herewith with the following information from the records of this office: It appears from the rolls of the United States colored troops on file in this office that Turner Norman was enrolled on the 22d day of May, 1863, at New Berne, N. C., in Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment of United States Colored Troops, to serve three years or during the war, and mustered into service as a corporal on the 30th day of June, 1863, at New Berne, N. C., in Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment of United States Colored Troops, to serve three years, or during the war.

On muster-rolls of Company G of that regiment, from organization to December 31, 1863, he is reported present for duty; from December 31, 1863, to August 31, 1864, absent, "wounded in battle at Olustee, Fla., February 20, 1864;" September and October, "present for duty;" November and December, absent, "left with detachment at Jacksonville, Fla., since November 26, 1864;" January and February, 1865, "sick, with detachment at Jacksonville since November 26, 1864;" from February 28, 1865, to April, 1866, "present for duty." He was mustered out of service with company at Charleston, S. C., June, 1866. Company was in action at battle of Olustee, Fla., February 20, 1864.

Company or regimental records do not give the location of wound.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. W. NICKERSON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

TO COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C.

It can not be controverted that widow's husband was a soldier, and that while actually engaged with the enemy he received a wound of the head which confined him to the hospital for a considerable length of time, thus impairing his health; that beyond his regular monthly pay soldier never received other compensation for the disability thus incurred. Your committee are still of the opinion that the equity and justice of this case are with the widow, who is now poor and destitute, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

SIMMONS W. HARDEN.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is a report on the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden, which has been vetoed by the President. I ask that the report be printed, and that it lie over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[H. R. 1406. Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Simmons W. Harden, late a private in Company L, First Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $16 per month.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

GRANTING A PENSION TO SIMMONS W. HARDEN.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden, submit the following report:

The objections of the President are set forth in his message (Executive Document 252), which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I hereby return, without approval, bill No. 1406, which originated in the House of Representatives, and is entitled "An act granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden."

The claimant mentioned in this bill enlisted as a private December 30, 1863, and was discharged May 17, 1865.

He filed an application for pension in 1866, in which he alleged that he was injured in the left side by a fall from a wagon while in the service.

In 1880 he filed another application, in which he claimed that he was afflicted with an enlargement of the lungs and heart from overexertion at a review. His record in the Army makes no mention of either of these troubles, but does show that he had at some time during his service dyspepsia and intermittent fever.

The fact that fourteen years elapsed after he claimed to have been injured by a fall from a wagon before he discovered that enlargement of the lungs and heart was his real difficulty is calculated to at least raise a doubt as to the validity of his claim.

The evidence as to his condition at the time of enlistment, as well as since, seems quite contradictory and unsatisfactory. The committee to which the bill was referred report that "the only question in the case is as to his condition at time of enlistment, and the evidence is so flatly contradictory on that point that it is impossible to decide that question."

Notwithstanding this declaration it is proposed to allow him a pension of $16 a month, though he has survived all his ailments long enough to reach the age of seventy-two years.

I think, upon the case presented, the action of the Pension Bureau overruling his claim should not be reversed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1886.

It appears from the papers submitted to your committee that Simmons W. Harden enlisted in Company L, First Iowa Cavalry, December 30, 1863, and was discharged May 17, 1865. On the 23d day of July, 1866, he filed an application for a pension, alleging "that on the 25th day of March, 1864, while dipping water from the Mississippi River for the use of the company, he was standing on the spoke of the wagon-wheel and fell on his right side on the tire of the wheel. It was a cold day. As fast as water was spilled on the wheel it froze, causing him to slip. He was so disabled that he was sent to the post hospital at Davenport March 30, 1864, where he remained eleven days. He was then sent to his company and detailed as cook, which duty he performed until he was discharged, with the exception of the time from March 1, 1865, to May 1, 1865, during which time he was in Overton Hospital, Memphis, receiving treatment for this injury." Subsequently, in June, 1880, he filed a supplemental declaration, alleging that at Little Rock, Ark., on the 24th day of June, 1864, his company was dismounted and marched on double-quick 2 miles, causing him to become overheated and resulting in enlargment of the heart, producing organic heart trouble, pain, and palpitation of the heart, fullness in the cardiac region, excessive and great nervousness, and frequent unconsciousness.

The following is a complete summary of the evidence on file in this case:

Dr. D. C. Hastings testifies that he was personally acquainted with claimant from 1855 till enlistment, and that he was during all that time free from disease.

A. D. Hastings testifies that he knew claimant for the seven years prior to enlistment, and that he was sound.

E. A. Harden testifies to prior acquaintance with claimant, and to his soundness at enlistment.

W. H. Keeling testifies that he became acquainted with him in 1861, and in the winter of 1861 and 1862 he employed him to take recruits from Marqueton to Dubuque when the railroads were blocked with snow, and from the nature of the service knows that he must have been a stout, healthy man. He met him again in 1863, and saw nothing to lead him to suppose he was not a sound man.

David Swartz and Felix Kitch testify as to his soundness at time of enlistment, and that on March 25, 1864, while standing on the hub of the wheel of a wagon while getting water for his company, he fell, striking on the top of the wheel, causing severe injury. Also that at Little Rock, Ark., June 24, 1864, he became overcome with heat from marching 2 miles on double-quick, injuring him so as to unfit him for duty, and rendering it necessary to send him to the hospital. Subsequently, in answer to an official letter, this witness says he knows positively that claimant was so overcome with heat that he fell in a fit, and was thereafter unfit for duty; that he, witness, and another comrade caught him as he fell; that afterwards he complained of his lungs, was unable to wear a belt, and was detailed as cook. C. S. Newell, another comrade, testifies to claimants being overcome with heat as claimed.

George M. Minkler testifies that in December, 1863, we enlisted together in the First Iowa Cavalry; had known him for several years and his health was good and he could do any kind of manual labor. I never knew him to suffer from sickness until the 24th of June, 1864; at that time we were marching from Fort Cotton to the arsenal grounds, 2 miles east of the fort at Little Rock, and when we formed into line he was suddenly taken sick and almost fainted. David Swartiel and I caught him in our arms and had to hold him up. We requested him to go to hospital, and if I remember right we accompanied him to the hospital. I thought at the time that he had a sunstroke. He was on the sick-list a long time and was cupped and blistered several times. From that time he was never fit to do a soldier's duty; he could not ride on horseback nor wear a belt. He was detailed to do light work, cooking for the mess, &c.

R. W. Bodell testifies that he went with claimant to enlist; that both were stripped naked and passed as sound, which he believes they both were at that time. William Miller, another comrade, testifies that he knew claimant intimately from 1856, living within 40 rods of him, and boarding for a long time at his house. Knew him to perform all kinds of hard labor. The country was new at that time and he did a great amount of chopping and logging. Knew him to be sick in service; visited him in hospital in Memphis. Would not be positive what he was treated for, but think it was some kind of heart disease. J. M. Simeral, lieutenant of the company, testifies as to the incurrence of sunstroke and his subsequent unfitness for general duty; that he remained with the company and did such light duty as he was able to do until March 1, 1865, when he was sent to hospital and remained until May 17, when he was discharged.

A. G. Hastings testifies that claimant was an able-bodied man at time of enlistment, and that since his discharge he has been unable to perform manual labor, and that he is now wholly disabled from earning his support.

Dr. D. C. Hastings testifies to treatment for heart disease from soon after discharge until 1867.

Dr. E. M. Wilson testifies that he is well acquainted with claimant, and that he has suffered with heart disease ever since discharge.

Emily Summers and Emerson Harding testify that claimant was absolutely free from any heart disease at time of enlistment, and has been affected ever since discharge with that disability.

Thomas Lare testifies that claimant has been unable to perform any manual labor since 1870.

H. B. Grabee testifies that he has known claimant since 1872, and that he has been unable to perform any manual labor.

A. G. Hastings, E. A. Harden, Felix Kitch, and G. G. Newell testify that claimant has been unable to do any manual labor since discharge on account of heart disease. The examining surgeon at Independence, Iowa, reported June 30, 1867, that he is three-fourths disabled from heart disease.

The examining surgeon at Falls City, Nebr., reported September, 1881, that he was one-half disabled from same disability, a subsequent examination at Pawnee recommended a third of a third grade pension for same cause.

The adverse testimony is as follows: E. W. Hastings testifies that claimant was troubled in breathing when overworked before he enlisted.

H. G. Chamberlain testifies that he had heard that claimant had heart disease before enlistment, but that his memory is not clear in the matter.

A. P. Bunhus testifies that claimant was sound at enlistment and he did not hear him complain of heart disease until 1867.

W. T. Wallace testifies that he did not consider him fit for service at enlistment, and that he never performed much duty. (Special examiner says this witness is unreliable.)

Hugh Henry testifies that claimant complained, before enlistment, of his heart fluttering when he overworked. That he had seen him frequently when he would be short of breath after getting excited.

The special examiner in the case reports that he is reliably informed that Dr. Hastings's reputation is not good.

The special examiner closes his report as follows: From the evidence before me and the impressions I have formed of the honesty and reliability of the claimant and his witnesses I am of the opinion that the claim is meritorious.

From the evidence submitted it would seem to be clearly proven that this man, nearly fifty years of age when he enlisted, was at that time able to do all kinds of hard manual labor, that he received an injury and a sunstroke in the service and was ever after unable to labor for his subsistence. That the disability has contiued ever since, and that he is now, at the age of seventy-two years, destitute and dependent on friends for support. That he was suffering at discharge and has suffered ever since from heart disease is well established. It would seem that a pension can only be denied him on the theory that the disease existed at the time of enlistment.

The act of March 3, 1885, provides "that all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment, but such presumption may be rebutted." This, in the judgment of your committee, has not been done. Only three witnesses testify on this point, and they say that when overworked or excited he was short of breath. How many members of this body could work earnestly at hard, manual labor for an hour without being affected in the same way? Nearly a dozen witnesses testify positively that he was not only able but did perform the most arduous labor prior to enlistment. When the Government accepted this man its chosen agent stripped him and giving him a thorough examination pronounced him sound. After seventeen months of service they discharged him, broken down and unable to earn a livelihood, and now after waiting twenty years he is denied the pittance which would enable him to eke out a scanty subsistence, upon the petty evidence that when he overworked or got excited he seemed troubled with shortness of breath. It is contemptible for a rich and powerful Government to interpose such a trivial plea to avoid the payment of a small pension to a man who cheerfully offered his life in its defense. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SOWDEN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, reported the joint resolution (H. Res. 54) to credit Lieuts. Giles B. Harber and William H. Schuetze with sea-duty and sea-pay while engaged in the search for Lieutenant Chipp and party, and also for the time employed in bringing home the remains of Lieutenant-Commander De Long and party; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report in regard to the loaning of tents.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the next amendment to the general deficiency bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 65 of the bill, amend by adding as an additional paragraph the following:

"For pay of judgments and awards recovered against the United States, reported by the Attorney-General, under the provisions of chapter 359 of the laws of 1885, approved March 3, 1885"——

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, that amendment is a very long one, and I think we can save time by not reading it in full. It embraces the judgments for damages by the overflow of lands on the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and it will be found printed at length in a previous issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I therefore move that the present reading of it be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. HAMMOND] announced that the noes seemed to have it.

A MEMBER. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 47.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to make the point of no quorum, because so much time is consumed in the count by tellers, but I will ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to this amendment.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 32, noes 126; and, more than one-fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 81, not voting 88; as follows:

Mr. BEACH with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, for this day.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DAVIS, until further notice.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. GOFF, for this day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on which a separate vote was demanded was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"And to the widow of J. C. Holmes, a contestant for the seat from the eighth district of Iowa in the Forty-sixth Congress, $1,000."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 103, noes 46.

Mr. TURNER. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TURNER and Mr. HEPBURN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 67.

Mr. TURNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being—ayes 24, noes 137; less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to offer the following amendment——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAMMOND). It is not in order now to offer any amendment. The House is voting upon the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole under the operation of the previous question.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on which a separate vote was demanded was read, as follows:

On page 68, after line 1661, insert the following:

"To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1886, including the Official Reporters of the two Houses and the Capitol police, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available."

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask the yeas and nays at once on this proposition without further delay.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 31, noes 131—less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Before the result of the vote on ordering tellers was announced,

Mr. REAGAN said: I make the point that no quorum voted upon the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum is needed on the question of ordering the yeas and nays. There was not one-fifth of a quorum voting in the affirmative. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. REAGAN. I asked for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 31, noes 131.

Mr. REAGAN. But before the result was announced I made the point that there was no quorum voting on that vote. [Cries of "Too late!"] It is not too late; the announcement of the result had not been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas did not hear the announcement of the Chair that no quorum is needed upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays, but in fact there were 162 voting.

Mr. REAGAN. How many rose on ordering tellers? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The "regular order" is for gentlemen to be quiet enough to allow the Chair to hear what is going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As soon as order is restored the Chair will hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the Chair announced the number of members who rose to demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announced that one-fifth of a quorum had not voted in favor of ordering the yeas and nays; and after that tellers were demanded on the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the Chair, I think, made no announcement of the result of the vote upon ordering tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not say positively that he did.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only one-fifth of a quorum is required to order tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-three were required; and as the Chair remembers there were only twenty-eight voting to order tellers. The Chair understood that the count was announced, but it may not have been.

Mr. WADE. The Chair announced the vote on the question of tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the recollection of the Chair; but others do not confirm that recollection.

Mr. BURNES. I rise to a question of order. The point I submit is that an evident majority of the House is not disposed to let a minority present its views to the Chair. I demand that we shall have such order as will enable us to be heard by the Chair. Now, I understood the Chair to say that there were not one-fifth in favor of tellers. I ask whether it requires one-fifth. Does it not require only one-eighth?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it requires one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers.

Mr. BURNES. The point I present is this: It requires one-fifth of those present to order the yeas and nays; but I have never understood that it required one-fifth of those present to obtain tellers upon any question; and the proposition now pending before the Chair is as to what number is required in order to obtain tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting; and shall put questions in this form, to wit: "As many as are in favor (as the question may be) say ay;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are opposed say no;" if he doubts, or a division is called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and then those in the negative; if he still doubts, or a count is required by at least one-fifth of a quorum, he shall name one from each side of the question to tell the members in the affirmative and negative; which being reported, he shall rise and state the decision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, whether a motion is in order to lay that amendment on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not, unless the gentleman wants to take the bill with it.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to know whether the words "including the Official Reporters and Capitol police" were in the amendment as it was adopted in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. [Cries of "Regular order!"] This is the regular order, for I am asking for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must assume the Clerk is reading the amendment as it was adopted by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the question because I have no memory of such words being included in the amendment as it was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know how that may be.

Mr. REAGAN. I read the amendment at the table when it was pending, and it provided for the annual and sessional employés of the House. It did not speak of the reporters or the police. They must have been entered since the committee acted on the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is impossible for the Chair to settle the question.

Mr. BAYNE. Was not the amendment adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; all this controversy was as to whether there should be yeas and nays or not.

Mr. RANDALL. The Official Reporters were included in the amendment as it was adopted in committee. I know it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Texas is entirely mistaken; and I wish to read this amendment precisely as it left my hands and went to the Clerk's desk.

It is as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employés of the House of Representatives borne on the annual and session rolls on the 30th day of June, 1886, including the Official Reporters of the two Houses and the Capitol police, one month's extra pay at the compensation then paid them by law, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that is precisely the amendment which has been read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I must have been mistaken as to the amendment.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 86.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, demanded tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The result has not yet been announced. The vote was 124 in the affirmative and 86 in the negative; so the ayes have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a question of order as to the competency of the gentleman's moving to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no record.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman did not vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no knowledge of how any gentleman voted.

Mr. HEPBURN. I assert that he voted in the negative and not in the affirmative.

Mr. BRUMM. He will not deny it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not try that question. He knows nothing of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not in order, as the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is in order to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. HOLMAN. Not while the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a point of order. The Chair must be advised the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was opposed to the amendment, and therefore could not make the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair long since stated he has no information on the subject and overruled the point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Chair can not entertain that motion because he must know he voted in the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the question now is on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and upon that the yeas and nays were demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 53 voting therefor; which was more than one-fifth of those present.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 106, not voting 98; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. FORNEY, on the extra pay in the deficiency bill. If present, Mr. WARD, of Indiana, would vote "ay," Mr. FORNEY "no."

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BAYNE, for the rest of the day.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. ATKINSON, for the rest of the day.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. TOWNSHEND, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

And then (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by the Chief Clerk, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 9, 1886.

SIR: Hon. COURTLAND C. MATSON is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. MATSON accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole favorably be taken up and passed with the understanding that those which have been objected to may be laid aside informally.

There was no objection.

ABBY L. BURBANK.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (S. 2192) granting a pension to Abby L. Burbank.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand there was some arrangement made to amend that bill; but I believe neither of the gentlemen interested in it is here.

Mr. BRADY. I am here, having made the report in that case; and by request of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wish to call it up for action. The amendment I propose to submit I am informed is acceptable to all parties. Would it be in order now to offer the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be in order only by unanimous consent; but the Chair is informed that there was an agreement that it would be voted upon when a quorum was present.

Mr. BRADY. I understand the amendment I propose to offer will obviate the objection which has been made.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. WINANS, who made the objection, is not present.

Mr. BRADY. I understand from Mr. GALLINGER that Mr. WINANS will agree to withdraw the objection if the amendment I propose is adopted.

I move to strike out "forty" in the bill and insert "thirty;" so that it will read "thirty dollars per month."

Mr. BLANCHARD. When was this bill reported from the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two weeks ago to-night.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Was the amendment the gentleman proposes adopted in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BRADY. No, it is just proposed by me for the first time.

It is to cut down the amount allowed, as there is a difference of opinion as to the rank of the doctor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state for the information of the committee that it was considered in the Committee of the Whole and reported to the House with the understanding that a vote would be taken when a full House was present. In fact that was the agreement. The gentleman from Kansas asks that it be considered now, and the Chair understands that the gentleman from Michigan who objected has agreed that if the rate of pension be reduced to $30 instead of $40, as reported from the Committee of the Whole, he will be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. BRADY. I am informed that such is the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment may then be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. PETERS. I will state that I know the fact from Mr. GALLINGER that such was the agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendments were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4265) granting a pension to Josiah Mahoney;

A bill (H. R. 887) granting a pension to Thomas S. Duvall;

A bill (H. R. 8635) granting a pension to Irene Googins;

A bill (H. R. 8150) granting a pension to Jesse Campbell;

A bill (H. R. 7418) granting a pension to Emily Threadgill;

A bill (H. R. 8963) granting a pension to Michael Fitzpatrick;

A bill (H. R. 8057) for the relief of Theodore Dunmire; and

A bill (H. R. 578) for the relief of Emma J. Halloway.

EDWARD CORNING.

The following Senate bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment, was considered, namely:

The bill (S. 1666) granting a pension to Edward Corning.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. My recollection is that the bill was amended to conform to the pension laws simply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the rate of pension proposed by the bill and insert:
"Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MARTIN V. CURRY.

The following House bill reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment was considered, the amendment concurred in, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed; namely:

A bill (H. R. 9457) granting a pension to Martin V. Curry.

CATHARINE WATERS.

The bill (H. R. 325) granting a pension to Catharine Waters was reported by the Committee of the Whole without recommendation and an amendment pending.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is not this one of the bills which were objected to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was reported to the House without recommendation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It was reported with the recommendation that there should be a vote in a full House upon it. I sought to-day in good faith to obtain a vote on the bill, but the Speaker held an agreement in Committee of the Whole can not bind the House. That leaves the bill as reported by the Committee of the Whole. I ask for action now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that the bill was reported to the House with the recommendation that it be acted upon in a full House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The agreement was that it should be engrossed and read a third time and the previous question ordered on the passage, and action taken in a full House to-day.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is this the case of Catharine Waters?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that this bill go over for action in a full House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Speaker decided that it could not be acted on in a full House under such an agreement as has been made. To lay it over as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas virtually ends all action on it.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the gentleman from Illinois misapprehends the situation. We are now in the House, and can bind the House with regard to its action to-morrow. I ask that the bill go over till to-morrow with the previous question ordered, on the understanding that a vote shall take place on it in a full House.

Mr. GROUT. That will bind the House to take action on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If this bill can be put in a position where on to-morrow I can force a vote on it under a demand for the previous question I have no objection; but unless it is put in that position, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL]. He asks unanimous consent that this bill be engrossed and read a third time, and that the previous question be ordered on its passage, with the further agreement that a vote be taken in the House in the morning after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. On last Friday there was a distinct understanding with reference to this bill that it should be reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House without recommendation, and that in the House with a quorum present the report should be read and ten minutes allowed on each side. With that understanding I agreed to the proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the arrangement as to the ten minutes' debate on each side be added now.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no objection to the House to-night renewing that understanding. But I desire to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] it is utterly useless to attempt to pass the bill here to-night without a quorum.

Mr. MORRILL. I will add to the request that ten minutes' debate be allowed to each side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas modifies his request so as to include in the arrangement that there shall be ten minutes' debate on each side; and also, as the Chair understands, that the report be read, the bill to come up for action to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BLANCHARD. With the further understanding that this bill be reported to the House without recommendation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is in the House now.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I shall object to any proposition which carries this bill to the House with a favorable recommendation. If that is involved in this request for unanimous consent, I shall object.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill is in the House now. The proposition is merely that it shall be remitted to a yea-and-nay vote in a full House.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The bill is here then without recommendation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. That there may be no misunderstanding the Chair will repeat the request of the gentleman from Kansas. He asks unanimous consent that this bill be engrossed and read a third time and that the previous question be ordered on its passage, so that the bill may be considered to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, and then that there shall be allowed ten minutes' debate on each side, and that the report shall also be read to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNES. I am compelled to object to the arrangement. But if the arrangement is so modified that the vote shall be taken after the passage of the general deficiency bill, I shall have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles were reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, the amendments were agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 9052) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John F. Morris; and

A bill (H. R. 8352) for the relief of Lewis A. Cronkhite (the title was amended so as to read "A bill for the relief of Levi A. Cronkhite").

The bill (S. 1112) granting a pension to Phœbe H. Meech, reported with a favorable recommendation, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 8950) to remove the political disabilities of Francis Sorrell, of Roanoke County, Virginia, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

The bill (S. 2759) to remove the political disabilities of Willian H. F. Lee, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. SARAH YOUNG.

The bill (S. 2113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Young was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment, the amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. This being a Senate bill with an amendment, is it in order at this time to ask for a committee of conference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. The Senate may concur in the amendment. I object.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the various votes by which the bills had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY B. HOOK.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with instructions from the Committee on Pensions, I move that Senate bill 2095, a bill granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Hook, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole under the special order for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that bills upon the Calendar be called in regular order, and that when a bill is called unless some gentleman rises to ask for its consideration it be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair it is not necessary to ask unanimous consent for that, as the regular proceeding would be to call the bills in their order.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; but my proposition is that unless some gentleman rises and asks for the consideration of a bill when it is called the bill be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. We have followed that course on one or two occasions, and it seems to me that it has worked more satisfactorily than any other method we have adopted at these sessions.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] whether he will not consent that the order be followed which was followed at several of these pension session, members present calling up such bills as they desire to have considered?

Mr. FELTON. I object to that.

Mr. GUENTHER. I object to it also.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania then is that the bills on the Calendar be called in their regular order, and that when a bill is called unless some gentleman present rises and asks for its consideration it shall be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM J. OWINGS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4097) for the relief of William J. Owings.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that that bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I hope that will be done. This bill has been passed over several times at the request of Mr. HALE.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JACOB S. BIDDLE.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4712) to place the name of Jacob S. Biddle on the pension-roll.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that that bill be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it was understood that that motion was not necessary, but that bills would be laid aside informally, without losing their position on the Calendar, unless some gentleman should rise and ask that they be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect is the same.

There was no objection; and the bill was laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

EUGENE E. M'LEAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9115) for the relief of Eugene E. McLean.

Mr. MATSON. Having agreed with Mr. TUCKER that I would look after his bills, I ask the present consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all political disabilities imposed upon Eugene E. McLean, a citizen of New York, by the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REBECCA HOLLINGSWORTH HUMPHREYS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1625) granting a pension to Rebecca Hollingsworth Humphreys.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask that that bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rebecca Hollingsworth Humphreys, widow of Brigadier-General Andrew Atkinson Humphreys, deceased, late Chief of Engineers and brevet major-general of the United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1625) granting a pension to Rebecca Hollingsworth Humphreys, make the following report:

The committee adopt the Senate report, as follows:

"Andrew A. Humphreys was graduated at the United States Military Academy and appointed brevet second lieutenant, Second Artillery, July 1, 1831; promoted second lieutenant July 1, 1831, and served with his regiment in South Carolina and Florida until September, 1835, when he was detailed on surveying duty until January, 1836, and afterward took part with his regiment in the Florida war until September 30, 1836, when he resigned, having been promoted to first lieutenant August 16, 1836.

"He re-entered the service as first lieutenant, Topographical Engineers, February 13, 1839, and was on duty in connection with the improvement of Chicago

Harbor and the survey of the Oswego Harbor until October, 1839, when he was placed on duty in the Topographical Bureau, in this city, where he remained until March, 1843, with the exception that from September, 1841, until April, 1842, he again participated in the Florida war. From March, 1843, until December, 1851, he was on duty as assistant engineer in charge of works in New Jersey and on the Delaware River, and again in the Topographical Bureau and surveying the delta of the Mississippi. He was promoted captain May 31, 1848, and in 1853 was sent on special duty to Europe to examine means for the protection of delta rivers from inundation, and on duty in this city until 1861 in charge of the examination of the delta of the Mississippi, and also of explorations and surveys of the Pacific Railroad. He was a member of the board to revise the 'programme of instructions at the United States Military Academy,' and of the commission 'to examine into the organization, system of discipline, and course of instruction at the United States Military Academy,' in 1860. He was promoted major August 6, 1861.

"His service in the field during the late war commenced as chief topographical engineer on the staff of the commanding general, Army of the Potomac. On March 5, 1862, he was appointed colonel and aid-de-camp, and in the following month brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded the Third Division, Fifth Army Corps, and afterward the Second Division of the Third Corps, until July 10, 1863, when he became chief of staff to the commanding general, Army of the Potomac. He was promoted major-general of volunteers July 8, 1863, and lieutenant-colonel of engineers March 3, 1863; and from November 25, 1864, to June, 1865, he commanded the Second Army Corps. He commanded the district of Pennsylvania from August 5 to December, 1865, when he was placed in charge of levees on the Mississippi River. On August 8, 1866, he was appointed brigadier-general and Chief of Engineers, and retired at his own request, after over forty years' active service, on June 30, 1879.

General Humphreys received the brevets of colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general, United States Army, for gallant and meritorious services at the battles of Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, and Sailor's Creek.

In the discharge of his military duties General Humphreys displayed great zeal, intelligence, and conspicuous gallantry. Those who served under him had the highest confidence in his capacity to command and the greatest admiration of his soldierly qualities.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reported this bill how long this officer was on the retired-list before his death?

The CHAIRMAN. The report will give the gentleman that information.

Mr. BINGHAM. I can answer the gentleman. General Humphreys was on the retired-list from 1879 to 1883. He retired after forty years of service.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have doubted always the propriety of granting pensions in the cases of those who have been for a long period on the retired-list, that being in itself a form of pension, and I doubt now the propriety of increasing this pension above the regular rate. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the condition of this widow?

Mr. BINGHAM. The widow's condition is that of needing the aid of Congress.

Mr. McMILLIN. There are a great many who think they need such aid.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman asked a question and I answered it.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is this widow's age?

Mr. BINGHAM. I can not state. I can only say she has children thirty-five or forty years of age. Therefore she must be very far advanced in years.

Mr. BRADY. Nearly eighty.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move to amend the bill by striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS J. OWEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1289) granting a pension to Thomas J. Owen.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas J. Owen, late of Company B, Twelfth United States Infantry, in the war with Mexico.

The report (by Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1289) granting a pension to Thomas J. Owen, and the papers on file in relation thereto, have adopted as their report the Senate report on said bill, as follows:

"That the records in this case show that claimant was a private in Company B, Twelfth United States Infantry, Mexican war; that while in Mexico, and after the battle of Cerro Gordo, he was taken sick and became disabled, and has ever since suffered from said disability. Declaration for pension filed June 16, 1880; claim rejected March 14, 1883, on ground of "no records."

"Claimant's statements are corroborated by affidavits of comrades Addison, Vanarsdol, and John Inman, who testify as to claimant's soundness before enlistment, and to the disability contracted while in the line of his duty in Mexico; also by the affidavits of neighbors who have known claimant many years, and who knew of the continuance of the disability.

"Claimant's statement is further corroborated by the certificate of Examining Surgeon Thomas Lindsay, who rates his disability one-half for hemorrhoids, one-half for rheumatism.

"Taking into consideration all the evidence filed in this case, your committee believe it to be their duty to report in favor of this bill, and recommend its passage."

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I do not understand why it is proposed to pass a special bill to pension a soldier of the Mexican war, as this House has passed a general bill to pension such soldiers and that bill has gone to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the Senate has not acted upon it, and may not do so.

Mr. GLASS. I am opposed to passing a special bill when a general bill ought to be passed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The President might veto the bill to which the gentleman refers.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WALLIS PATTEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2026) granting a pension to Wallis Pattee.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Wallace Pattee, late a member of Company K, Seventh Regiment of Iowa Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 2026, having given the same due consideration, report:

That the right of Wallis Pattee to a pension is abundantly established by the facts set forth in the appended Senate report. Your committee therefore adopt said report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

That the records in this case show that claimant enlisted in October, 1861, and was discharged June 22, 1866, and that he was a lieutenant in Company K, Seventh Regiment Iowa Cavalry. Declaration for pension filed April 15, 1872, alleging ill-health following fever, from exposure and exhaustion. Claim rejected January 7, 1882, on the ground of no record of alleged diseases.

Presented with other papers from the Pension Office there is the statement of claimant as to time, place, and circumstances, given in considerable detail as to origin of the disability in the line of duty, which statement is corroborated in all its parts by the affidavits of claimant's lieutenant-colonel, John Pattee, by affidavit of Assistant Surgeon S. N. Pierce, by affidavits of Comrades Truman Pattee and W. W. Jones, by second affidavit of Dr. S. N. Jones as to claimant's condition since discharge from service and existence of disabilities incurred in service. Also affidavits of D. S. Bradford, M. D., corroborating the foregoing; also affidavit of J. M. Ball, M. D., corroborating above. Also the certificates of Examining Surgeon S. N. Pierce, who rates claimant's disabilities as "total." Also certificate of Examining Surgeon William Boys that disability is "probably permanent."

There are in this case on file with the papers nine affidavits, all substantiating the sworn testimony of the claimant, two of which are by surgeons appointed by the Pension Office expressly to examine such cases, and yet the case is rejected on the ground of "no record of alleged diseases."

Taking into consideration all the evidence on file in this case, the committee believe it to be their duty to report in favor of this bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to ask on what grounds the Committee on Invalid Pensions has arrived at the conclusion that it is necessary to override the opinion of the doctors employed by the Pension Office to decide upon this case. According to the report just read I can not see but that every effort has been made during the eight or nine years this case was before the Pension Office to prove that this man was really incapacitated by reason of service which he rendered during the war. I should like to hear, either from the gentleman who introduced the bill or from the member of the committee who reported it, on what ground it is proposed to override the opinion of the doctors employed by the Pension Office to investigate this case. I shall require some information on this point before this bill can pass with my consent.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman had listened to the reading of the report he would have observed that this application was rejected at the Pension Office because there was no hospital record of this soldier to show the disease from which he suffered. But there will be found on file affidavit after affidavit showing the existence of the disability during the soldier's service, which extended through nearly five years, and also affidavits showing the continuance of the disability from the time of his discharge up to the present date. After this bill came from the Senate I reported it from our committee. I sent for all the papers and looked through them to ascertain whether the statements of the Senate report were verified by the papers on file in the Pension Office——

Mr. WALLACE. What was the disability?

Mr. CONGER. I can not tell you. Having reported a very large number of cases, I can not remember the details of each one.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This bill does not fix the rate?

Mr. CONGER. It does not fix the rate; that will be fixed afterward upon examination at the Pension Office.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does not the report show the disease or disability under which this soldier suffered?

Mr. CONGER. It does not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Can the gentleman give us any information on that point?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I can not. I simply know that the papers on file in the Pension Office verified every statement of the Senate report, showing clearly that there was a disability; and I suppose the man's right to a pension would not be invalidated, whether he was suffering from one disease or another, if he contracted the disease in the service and has been suffering from it ever since.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the disease?

Mr. CONGER. And the degree of the disability will be established by the examination hereafter at the Pension Office.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see that there is proved in this case any disability which was the direct result of service in the war. The report read to us does not describe any such disability. It does not appear that there has been any loss of limb or any serious wound or any disease incurred in the service. This man may have died, like the gentleman who was reported the other night to have died, of hay fever or of cold in the head.

I do not think we are prepared to vote for this bill. I do not see any reason stated in the report why we should vote for a pension in this case. I therefore raise my objection to it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. The report in this case fails to show the disease.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask that this bill be recommitted.

The CHAIRMAN. You can not recommit a bill in the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The report in this case certainly should show the disability occasioned by wound or disease contracted in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir; and I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LYMAN. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 14.

So the motion was agreed to.

MRS. JANE R. M'QUAIDE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide, mother of F. G. Mc Quaide, deceased, late a private in Company C, Ninth Regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1852, have considered the same, and report.

This bill is for the relief of a dependent mother. The merit of the case is fully set forth in the Senate report appended hereto.

Your committee therefore adopt the same as their own, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The petitioner is the mother of F. G. McQuaide, deceased, late a private in Company C, Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. The application was rejected on the ground that the claimant was not dependent on the soldier at the date of his death.

The evidence shows that the father and mother were living on a farm at the time of the son's enlistment, prior to which he had contributed by his labor to their support; that he sent them a portion of his monthly pay; that he died shortly after his discharge from disease contracted in the service; that his father owned a farm, but it was heavily mortgaged, and that the dockets contained innumerable judgments against him; that he died poor, leaving his widow in destitute circumstances; that she is still very needy.

The committee report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask again, Mr. Chairman, what was the wound or the disease this soldier died of? I do not see that there was any specific case of disease stated in the report.

Mr. CONGER. I can only say in regard to this case, as I said in regard to the other case, that the papers in the Pension Office substantiate this report of the Senate. As to what was the disability I can not remember. In these cases of dependence the committee adopted the rule that where the parents were in destitute circumstances at the present time to recommend the bill favorably to the House.

The committee has reported to the House a general bill on the subject, which is upon the Calendar now. We thought this bill fell within that rule, and reported it to the House favorably. If it were a House bill I could speak of it, of course, more in detail.

Mr. WALLACE. Did this man die of any disease contracted in the service, or was his death the result of natural causes?

Mr. CONGER. The report says he died of disease contracted in the service.

Mr. WALLACE. What disease?

Mr. CONGER. I can not tell you now. There does not seem to be any question on that point in the report.

Mr. WALLACE. Did he die soon after the war?

Mr. CONGER. Yes; he died soon after the war.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman from Louisiana will look at the report, he will see it states that he died immediately after the war with disease contracted in the service. It further seems there was no trouble in the Department about his having died of disease contracted in the service. The question was as to dependence. From the report it seems it was determined there was dependence. The report is quite brief, but it develops these facts.

Mr. WALLACE. I protest against the passage of bills of this character appropriating money out of the Treasury of the United States confided to Congress as a fund absolutely fulfilling all the requirements of a trust fund. The committee in this report do not specify the cause of death. They do not specify the disease of which this man died. They do not say in terms that it was contracted in the service. They seem to infer that Congress is an eleemosynary institution to vote funds for unfortunate relatives of others. I sympathize most cordially with sufferers of that kind, but I do not think this House of Representatives has been created for any such purpose.

I gave a great deal of thought and careful consideration to this subject before I entered my protest three weeks ago in reference to these matters. I then stated what my opinion was of this system of legislation. What has occurred since then has presented no fact which would lead me to change my opinion; nor have I had reason from anything which has occurred outside to retrace my steps. I have failed to find any opposition raised by the free and independent thought of the country against the opinion I then expressed. On the contrary, the President of the United States by his veto messages has apparently indorsed the ground I then took. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] It pleases me to hear on that side of the House derisive laughter. I can easily understand what a sad and sorrowful laugh it is.

A MEMBER. Yes; it is.

Mr. WALLACE. The messages of the President vetoing cases of the character which I protest against will go into the district of every one of these laughing gentlemen, and it will take them every hour during the fall campaign to explain their participation in this character of legislation condemned in so many instances by the Chief Magistrate of this nation.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. The Democratic chairman of the Pensions Committee says the President is wrong. [Laughter on Republican side.]

Mr. WALLACE. I am delighted to hear laughter from that side of the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I am not on that side of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, then, stay on your own side.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. But I do not want you to read me out of the party.

Mr. WALLACE. I have sat here for the last two or three weeks on these pension nights and listened to the most magnificent display of elocutionary fireworks from that side of the House on these pension cases that I suppose has ever been delivered in this Hall. All the grandeur of patriotism that this country has ever displayed one would suppose is evidenced on that side of the House, and the only platform for the soldier to stand upon, if we belive it, comes from that side.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir; not at present.

Mr. CRAIN. Then I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. I would like to know what the gentleman is speaking to. His remarks are not germane to the report of the committee or the pending bill. I raise the point of order upon him that he is indulging himself in some of the pyrotechnical displays such as he charges the other side with. [Laughter and applause].

Mr. WALLACE. I am rather afraid that I have taken a seat on the wrong side of the House, since all of these interruptions are from this side.

Mr. CRAIN. I was sitting here on this side of the House before the gentleman was even elected—by accident. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. WALLACE. Coming by accident is better than coming by bulldozing.

Mr. CRAIN. Well, that comes with bad grace from a man from Louisiana.

Mr. WALLACE. I will not yield to the gentleman. I have the floor. I did not hear the gentleman and can not answer his interruption.

Mr. CRAIN. I repeat, it comes with bad grace, Louisiana charging Texas with bulldozing, when every man of you from Louisiana, if the truth be as sometimes charged, came in that way.

Mr. WALLACE. I have told the gentleman that I decline to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted, and public business will be suspended until order is preserved in the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will take the floor when I can get it to respond to that remark about Louisiana.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not hear the gentleman's remark.

Mr. CRAIN. I repeat, I say it comes with bad grace from Louisiana to charge me with being here by bulldozing.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But as I understand it you said that every one of us from Louisiana came here in that way.

Mr. CRAIN. No, sir; I said that if the truth was as stated. It has been so alleged. I do not make the charge.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Well, that puts a very different phase upon the matter. I did not understand the gentleman in that way.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, we will admit it anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. You are too ready to admit it.

Mr. WALLACE. It is most extraordinary that a member can not rise here and express his opinion without being constantly interrupted with these irrelevant matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until order is restored upon the floor. Members will resume their seats, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the main aisle is cleared. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. WALLACE. It has been such a long interregnum that the line of thought has been entirely lost. I nearly forgot the point I was discussing at the time. But I wanted again to call attention to this Friday evening pension legislation. For several days we have heard nothing but expressions of would-be patriotism from Republican members on this question of pensions. Three weeks ago, sir, I raised my voice in opposition to this mode of considering bills, for the purpose of giving gentlemen fair notice in time, so that it could not be said snap judgment had been taken upon them. This is the third Friday night since that time. I have failed to see here any considerable addition to the number of members upon that side of the House, which pretends to take such an interest in this subject. In fact the House is scarcely visible otherwise than by its array of empty benches. The excessive patriotism of the gentlemen seems to ebb out at 5 o'clock, when the dinner-bell rings, and they consider the day's duty is over.

If patriotism is so great on this subject of pensions on that side of the House, and all those gentlemen are so anxious for these pension bills, and so desirous that they shall become laws, is it not reasonable to suppose that they will sacrifice themselves a little and have a larger attendance? It was my misfortune in coming here by accident, and so late in the session, to be compelled to take a seat on the Republican side of the House; but in anticipation that there were to be such numbers of Republican members to attend these sessions I gave up my seat on that side on the first opportunity and came over here. Still I can not find that any considerable number have taken the great interest in these proceedings that we are led to believe they do take by the clamor which is raised.

As to this question of pensions, and to all other questions wherein an appropriation of money is taken from the Treasury, I hold that it is outrageous legislation to permit a small minority as we have here at these night sessions to act upon them.

This is peculiarly the case with pensions, for we find as a rule that the members, with rare exceptions (and they are rare, indeed), are all interested in the passage of particular pension bills; and being interested in a particular bill, they are not so apt to scrutinize as carefully as they otherwise would the weak bills that some friend wants to get through. They will pass over the weak and pernicious bills of other members in order that their own bills, which may or may not be good, may receive that consideration they would like them to receive.

The result of that is that a large number of bills have gone for consideration to the President which have not had that merit which all bills should have which pass this House. The President of the United States should not be under the necessity of raising questions on the merits of the extraordinary number of bills upon which he has been called to act at this session of Congress. I do not care how narrow-sighted the President might be, or how seriously he might regard the duties devolving on him, I claim that this House of Representatives should so closely scrutinize everything that goes out from it, should so carefully watch each point in its legislation, that nothing could emanate from it that could be objected to so frequently by the Executive, with his numerous cares and duties, unless he had to strain a point much more broadly than he has done on any bill I have heard read in this House with his veto attached to it.

From that consideration, and that alone, from the desire that the record of this House should be preserved in its integrity, that all the ancient customs of this House, all its glorious privileges, and all its grand history should be preserved, I have taken a ground that I know will be unpopular with many members of this House. I have taken a step that does not meet the approbation of many of my opponents politically, and perhaps meets the disapproval of some of my friends.

But a sense of duty makes me stand here and assert the views I hold, that we should not send from this House as accepted by this House, or by a majority of this House, such a series of bills as we frequently pass here and send to the Senate or to the President for his approval. I claim that each bill that comes here should have a certain amount of supervision. I go back in the records for several months and find bill after bill passed without the reading of the report and with I do not know how few members present—the record does not show the latter—but bills passed on their title simply. Has that Committee on Invalid Pensions considered those bills and reported them at all unanimously?

A MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. Not, as I am informed, by a great deal.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not desire to yield to any one at present. The gentleman has all night before him to reply.

Mr. STRUBLE. If the gentleman from Louisiana does not yield, I make the point that he is not talking to the question.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is not his fault. He can not help it. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. If he can not help it, he should sit down.

Mr. WALLACE. If I have said anything you do not like, you have the privilege of answering me.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. You do not understand the customs of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I insist the gentleman from Louisiana is in order, and has a right to be heard.

Mr. STRUBLE. I insist he is not talking to the question before the House, and I ask the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled on the point of order, by asking the gentleman from Louisiana to proceed in order.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he agreed with the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in his speech this day before this House in reference to the pension bill returned by the President of the United States, upon which the House was addressed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]—whether he agreed with him when he said he (Mr. MATSON) thought the President was wrong and whether he will vote to overrule the action of the President and sustain the unanimous vote of the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. WALLACE. I will answer that question when the bill comes up before the House for action. It is not pertinent to the question now before the committee. I am not making a prophet of myself.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. No one will ever take you for a prophet or the son of a prophet.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think this sort of argument is profitable in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. WALLACE. I feel very honest in the action I have taken. I have no objection in the world to the passage of legitimate pension bills, to the passage of legitimate appropriations of money out of the Treasury for private claims in any way when it is done in a legitimate manner; but I do most seriously object, and I shall continue to object, to a body of men coming to this House, all of them interested in a specific style of legislation, and passing bills indiscriminately without a proper consideration of those bills, as has been the case during this entire session. If thirty-six members from the State of New York should happen to assemble here on a particular night set aside for appropriations, and should pass an appropriation for their State of a million dollars, that would be thought a terrific outrage. But members come here whose interest is as individual as that would be, and pass pension bills—men who utilize them for electioneering purposes. They do not give them that consideration which they ought to receive, and those bills do not go out from this body with that stamp of merit on them which they should have as coming from this House of Representatives.

I therefore enter my protest—I enter it now and have entered it before against the form of legislation we have had here to-night. The reports accompanying the bills do not even assign the origin of the disease, do not even name the disorder of which the soldier died, do not tell us anything about it; but we are asked to pass them indiscriminately and without question. We are told it does not make any difference so long as they go to the President. And a large number of members in this House are glad that they do go to the President, so that they may be returned with his veto, and thus give them an opportunity to make political speeches against him for vetoing bills which have no justice, no right, and which should never have emanated from a House of the distinguished antecedents of the House of Representatives.

Whether I am condemned or whether I am not condemned by gentlemen present, or by this House at large in session with a quorum, I make the assertion that this is not right, that it is not proper, that it is not legitimate legislation. It is setting a precedent that may lead in the future to far worse things than the passage of a few small pension bills. There is no reason why we should not set aside an evening for the passage of bills appropriating money for private claims, and with a precedent before us of this kind I see no reason why such action should not result in something very serious in the future. Therefore, as a Representative upon this floor, I object to it. And it makes no difference how late I came here, I am as much a Representative as any man on this floor; I have the same rights here under the Constitution as any other man on this floor.

As long as I am a member of this House I propose to maintain my rights, and I shall act upon them, no matter whether my action is favorably or unfavorably received by other gentlemen who happen to constitute a portion of this House. In the course that I am pursuing I feel that I have the approbation of men who look at this question from a proper standpoint, men who are as disinterested as I am, men who are as earnestly and cordially in favor of the passage of legitimate pension bills as I am. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] Yes, Mr. Chairman, since I first made this move I have had the approbation of men against whom not a single man on either side of this House can rise and say "My record is grander than yours in the war for the Union" [cries of "Who are they?" "Name!" "Name!"]—men whose names are emblazoned on every field where a battle has taken place and perpetuated by courage those scenes in history.

I have the approbation of such men, and whenever it is attempted to pass bills by such a body as this now present, a body so far short of a quorum of this House, not 20 per cent., not 15 per cent. of the full House, I feel that I have a right to object, and I shall object, no matter where my action may excite disapprobation. This is not proper legislation, and I shall raise my voice against it whenever an opportunity occurs.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, in order to test the sincerity of the learned doctor from Louisiana I ask unanimous consent to lay aside this bill and take up the next one, that being a case in which a specific disability is set forth, for his consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ISABELLA JESSUP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1853) granting a pension to Isabella Jessup.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that that bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isabella Jessup, widow of Mahlon Jessup, deceased, late a private in Company D, Fourteenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1853, having considered the same, report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, hereto attached, sets forth very clearly the facts in this case and establishes its merit. Therefore your committee adopt said report as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The petitioner is the widow of Mahlon Jessup, deceased, late a private in Company D, Fourteenth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers. At the battle of Shiloh the soldier was wounded in the left arm, from which erysipelas ensued before amputation. He was also wounded in one of his legs, and he was pensioned for loss of arm and leg wound at $8 a month, which was increased to $18 a month. At the time of his death the widow applied for a pension, but was rejected on the ground that his decease had no connection with the disabilities for which he was pensioned. The committee are of the opinion, from the testimony furnished by the claimant, that a different conclusion is justified. The wounds and amputation were enough to impair the man's health, and to this was added blood-poisoning from erysipelas. On this subject the testimony is ample, but we refer to only one witness, Dr. J. A. Day, who treated the soldier during his last sickness, and who says:

"The erysipelas that ensued amputation never left him, and he was subject to succeeding attacks. From the wound in the leg he complained almost constantly of pain. His last sickness was pneumonia of right lung, but the extent of lung trouble did not warrant an unfavorable prognosis. He sank as from blood-poison. The connecting pathology can only be explained in the following manner: On account of the gravity of his wounds his system had become a perfect wreck before he contracted pneumonia, and not being able to withstand such a shock, he succumbed readily in the face of all remedies that I and a consulting physician could bring to bear on his case."

This view is corroborated by other testimony. It is also in evidence that the widow is advanced in years and in such needy circumstances as to have become, to some extent, a recipient of charity.

The committee report the bill favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. WEAVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1421) granting a pension to William H. Weaver.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Weaver, late a private in Company I, One hundred and forty-third regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1421, have examined the same, and report:

That the facts set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions very clearly establish the merits of this case. Your committee are willing to adopt it as their own, append it hereto, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The claimant enlisted June 12, 1862, in Company I, One hundred and forty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served without interval, except when prevented by sickness, until his discharge, June 12, 1865. He applied for a pension November 8, 1877, and in his declaration avers that at Belle Plain Landing, Va., March 4, 1863, he was sick with measles; at Spottsylvania Court House, Va., May, 1864, he had remittent fever. As results of fever and measles is afflicted with weakness of limbs and disease of eyes. The Pension Office seems to have been in great doubt about this case, to aid in solving which six special examinations have been made. The special examiners have been sent repeatedly to Iowa and Pennsylvania in pursuit of testimony, and after all the expense and trouble incurred finally denied the relief for which the soldier sued. In two instances the special examiners reported favorably, declaring that there is evidence of disability and of its incurrence in the line of duty.

One of them concludes his report in these words:

"The claimant is given by all parties an excellent reputation for industry and honesty. Not a word to the contrary have I heard uttered. From all the evidence in the case it is my candid opinion that this is a just and honest claim, and the claimant should have the benefit of all doubts."

The committee, after a careful examination of all the evidence bearing upon the case, have arrived at the conclusion expressed by this examiner, that the claimant should have the benefit of whatever doubt may exist in consequence of his inability to procure the testimony exacted by the Pension Office, and therefore report the bill favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES LONG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7796) granting a pension to James Long.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, required to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Long, late of Company D, Ninety-third Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7796) granting a pension to James Long, submit the following report:

James Long was enrolled as a private in Company D, Ninety-third Ohio Volunteers; and, while marching with Sherman to the sea, sustained a rupture and varicose veins, from which he has never recovered. Claimant swears that his injuries were caused by his horse falling into a deep gully in the darkness of the night while on the march. There were but two witnesses to the accident, one of them now dead. The other, William Allison, testifies—

"That he was with claimant when he fell into a ravine. The night was very dark, raining, and road bad. Lieutenant Barin was along and saw accident, but he is now dead. Saw claimant twelve hours after accident, and examined injuries to groin and leg. Injured parts swollen and discolored. Thought he was ruptured, and talked to him about it at the time. Did not see claimant again until about one week after his discharge from the Army."

Abundance of good, reliable testimony shows that this soldier was perfectly sound when he enlisted, and that he is now a total wreck, being rated twelve-eighteenths by the board of surgeons at Dayton, Ohio. Special examiners recommend this claim for admission.

Two special examiners furnished the Pension Office with exhaustive reports, and both unqualifiedly recommended it for admission, but the claim was rejected because of no record of injury in service.

While the testimony is scarcely conclusive enough to justify the issuance of a certificate under a strict interpretation of the general pension laws, it is yet considered sufficient for favorable consideration by Congress, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. WALLACE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that when the question is put he has a right to vote in the negative, but his mere objection will not avail to prevent the bill from being favorably reported.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand that.

The question was taken; and the chairman decided that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 74, no 1.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY J. HAGERMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2160) granting a pension to Mary J. Hagerman.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. I ask that that bill be considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Hagerman, widow of Hiram P. Hagerman, late of Company G, Fifteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2160) granting a pension to Mary J. Hagerman, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to adopt the report of the Committee on Pensions, United States Senate, as their own, and likewise recommend the passage of the bill.

The petitioner is the widow of Hiram P. Hagerman, late of Company G, Fifteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Her husband was pensioned for a severe wound in his arm, which rendered it helpless, and caused him much suffering. The physician who attended him in his fatal illness says he died from malarial fever, brought on by overexertion. The wound, if not directly, was doubtless indirectly the cause of his death. In his disabled state he was compelled to labor as he best could for the support of his family. His overexertion brought on an illness of which he died, and his widow and children are thus prematurely deprived of his individual efforts for their maintenance and of the small pension allowed him.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN P. M'ELROY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2233) granting a pension to John P. McElroy.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John P. McElroy, formerly of Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2233) granting a pension to John P. McElroy, submit the following report:

The facts in this case are fully set forth in the Senate report, which your committee herewith adopt, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The certificate of the adjutant-general of the State of Missouri shows that this soldier was enrolled on the 11th day of August, 1862, at Bowling Green, in that State, in Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, to serve until further orders or during the war, and that he was mustered into the State service as a private on that day, at the place and in the regiment above given. The petitioner avers that while engaged in co-operating with the United States forces in Northeast Missouri he received a gunshot wound, caused by the accidental discharge of a musket, by which a musket-ball struck the under part of his jawbone, severing it, and passing upward, tearing and breaking the bones of his side face and head, severing and destroying the drum of the ear and totally destroying its hearing. He alleges that he is terribly disfigured and permanently disabled. All this is satisfactorily shown by the testimony of his comrades and officers, who were eye-witnesses and by the allegations of surgeons.

The applicant applied for a pension almost immediately after the occurrence, the Pension Office rejecting his claim on the ground that the organization to which he belonged was not, at the time the injury was received, under control of a military officer of the United States. In response to an inquiry of the Pension Office the Adjutant-General of the United States says there is no evidence of service rendered by McElroy on file in his office, or that the Forty-ninth Missouri Enrolled Militia was under control of a military officer of the United States during the period of alleged service.

On this point the testimony of Robert A. Campbell has some bearing. He says he was major of the Forty-ninth Missouri Enrolled Militia Volunteers, and was in active service in the field in August, 1862. About August 31, 1862, he, with a portion of his command, were stationed at Paris, Monroe County, scouting and guarding prisoners; that while a portion of his command was so employed at or near Floria, Mo., expecting an attack from the enemy, who were in the vicinity, the command of General John McNeil came into the vicinity of affiant's command, and being of higher rank than affiant and under command of General Lewis Merrill, United States Army, said McNeil took command as superior officer of the forces of Lieut. W. C. Kincaid, Company D, Capt. Benjamin Braustetter, Company G, of the Forty-ninth Missouri Enrolled Militia, and retained said forces under his command for scouting and military duty during the time that Lieutenant Kincaid's and Captain Braustetter's commands were under the command of General McNeil. He then goes on to show that McElroy, who was corporal of Company D, was wounded as alleged, connecting the injury to this man with the fact that he was serving under control of General Merrill, of the United States Army, at the time.

The Pension Office, however, does not accept this, in the absence of evidence from the Adjutant-General, as establishing the point necessary for the recognition of the petitioner's claim, and in a final letter the Commissioner says:

"It is a case in which the office can do nothing. A special act of Congress is the only source for relief."

For more than twenty years this man has been seeking relief from the Government in behalf of which he took up arms, and now, needy, advanced in years, and helpless from his injuries, he appeals to Congress. It is said that his relief should come from the State of Missouri, in whose service he received his injuries. The committee do not so regard it. The State of Missouri was co-operating with the United States to maintain the integrity of the Union; her forces were enrolled for that purpose, and they were at the disposal of the commanders of the Union armies; and there is reasonable evidence that the organization to which McElroy belonged was under control of a general of the United States Army.

Again, it has been said that his injuries may not have been the consequence of "certain military duties," as prescribed by a strict construction of the statute; but he was there—it was military duty and nothing else that he was doing—and his injuries were the result of his being where he was, and in the discharge of a duty that he dared not refuse to perform, and the purpose for which he was ordered to his duty was identical with that which the United States forces were performing in the same vicinity, and in reality under the same commander.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

POWHATTAN B. SHORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2163) granting a pension to Powhattan B. Short.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Powhattan B. Short, late a private in Company K, Sixty-eighth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2163) granting a pension to Powhattan B. Short, submit the following report:

Your committee, after a careful examination of this case, adopt the annexed Senate report, and recommend the passage of the bill:

The application of the petitioner was filed in the Pension Office and rejected—"Because the soldier was a militiaman, and not in the military service of the United States, and did not file his claim prior to July 14, 1874, the date of limitation for the filing of all claims on account of service in State militia." (Sec. 4693, Rev. Stats.)

The soldier was a private in Company K, Sixty-eighth Missouri Militia. The Pension Office does not reject his claim upon any other ground than that he was debarred by the expiration of the law before he filed his claim. The disability for which he seeks relief of Congress is injury to his eyes, incurred in the discharge of his duty as a soldier. There is no record evidence in his favor, but that circumstance, in his case, does not prejudice his claim, inasmuch as there is other proof that is sufficiently reliable.

Dr. Ira M. Raney testifies as follows:

"I am a practicing physician in the counties of Iron and Wayne, State of Missouri. On the 28th day of July, 1862, I was duly commissioned first assistant surgeon in the Sixty-eighth Regiment Cavalry, Enrolled Missouri Militia, and remained assistant surgeon up to the 12th day of March, 1865, when said regiment was disbanded; that Powhattan B. Short enlisted as a private in Company K of said regiment on July 28, 1862; that I, as assistant surgeon, examined said Short at the time he enlisted and found him physically a sound man; that while in the line of duty, and by exposure while scouting in Southeast Missouri, he contracted inflammatory sore eyes, and by overfatigue and exposure, with the best treatment I could give him, his case ran into a chronic ophthalmy before he was discharged from the service; that I have treated his case since and treated him very frequently, and the disease of his eyes has grown worse, and on a thorough examination I find that he is totally blind in right eye and can see very imperfectly out of the left; that said disease of the eyes was contracted while in said service and in the line of duty; that he, the said Short, has not now, nor any trace of ever having had, any other disease, and he does not use intoxicating drinks of any kind; that said company and regiment were co-operating with the United States forces at the time in suppressing the rebellion in the State of Missouri."

This testimony, in the opinion of the committee, sufficiently identifies the disability and the service.

The bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM BRENTANO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1766) granting a pension to William Brentano.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Brentano, late of Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1766) granting a pension to William Brentano, submit the following report:

Your committee, after a full examination of this case, adopt the annexed Senate report, and recommend the passage of the bill. The witnesses in this case are men of high character, and their statements are entitled to full credit.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1766) granting a pension to William Brentano, have examined the same, and report that the records in this case show that claimant enlisted as a private in Company B, Thirteenth Kansas Volunteers, August 19, 1862, and was discharged June 26, 1865.

The records from the Adjutant-General's Office show that claimant was in hospital at one time from October, 1862, until February, 1863, and also at other times, but the nature of the disease is not stated.

Declaration for pension filed June 30, 1880, alleging rheumatism and piles.

Claim rejected January 13, 1886, on the ground of insufficient testimony to establish origin and continuance of diseases.

The fact that claimant was accepted and mustered into the United States service is prima facie evidence of soundness at that time.

The testimony of John Frank Kotsch, claimant's first lieutenant, is to the effect that claimant was sound and strong when he enlisted, but that after a time he did have rheumatism, and that it was the result of exposure, and that claimant made a good soldier, and did detail duty when he was sick without complaining.

The testimony of John T. Kernan, a comrade, corroborates the foregoing. The affidavit of Dr. Charles C. Righter, dated April 9, 1885, shows continuance of these disabilities, and the certificate of Examining Surgeon Samuel W. Day, dated March 24, 1882, and certificate signed by Examining Surgeons James R. Duncan, J. T. Axtall, and E. P. Stearns, dated May 21, 1884, corroborates claimant's statement and the other examinations.

Taking into consideration all the evidence on file in this case, the committee believe it to be their duty to report in favor of this bill, and recommend its passage.

The question being taken, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

FRIDOLINE GLASTETTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2132) granting a pension to Fridoline Glastetter.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Fridoline Glastetter, late a private in Company F, Second Illinois Light Artillery Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2132) granting a pension to Fridoline Glastetter, submit the following report:

Your committee, after a full consideration of this case, adopt the following Senate report:

The petitioner was a private in Second Illinois Light Artillery. He enlisted December 12, 1861, and was honorably discharged December 14, 1864. He applied for a pension for rheumatism, alleged to have been contracted by breaking through the ice on the Mississippi River on the 9th of January, 1864, and subsequent exposure in wet clothing, while on his return from furlough. The Commissioner of Pensions does not deny the existence of the disability, but says it was not contracted in the line of duty. Appeal was made to the Secretary of the Interior, who sustains the rejection by the Commissioner. The records verify his service, and show that he was granted a furlough from November 21, 1863, to December 20, 1863, to enable him to provide a home for his children, his wife having died about that time. It is charged that he overstaid his time, and that it was after the expiration of his furlough that the accident occurred.

The Adjutant-General informs the Pension Office that there is no charge against him for desertion or absence without leave, and the committee are of opinion that a severe construction should not be put upon his delinquency in view of the fact that he was absent on the sad errand of providing a home and protection for his motherless children, and the necessity for his prolonged absence may have been imperative. At all events, there is no evidence that it was criminal; and inasmuch as it is the principal ground of his rejection, the committee report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The question having been taken on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass,

The CHAIRMAN said: In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 58, noes none.

Mr. WALLACE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of "no quorum" being made, the Chair will appoint tellers——

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WALLACE] has serious objections to this bill——

A MEMBER. He does not know anything about it.

Mr. MATSON. I will ask unanimous consent that it be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar; so that we may go on with other cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I object. I should not object if there were any objection to the bill itself; but not a word of objection has been urged against the merits of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr.

WALLACE] himself did not even vote against the bill; and he raises the question of a quorum.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Nothing can be said against the bill. I can not see any propriety in passing over the bill if no objection is offered against it. If we are informally to pass over bills to which there is no objection and are simply to sit here listening to the reading of reports and accomplishing nothing, that is mere boys' play.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WALLACE].

Mr. MATSON. I have a privileged motion. I move that the committee rise.

A MEMBER. Wait a moment. [A pause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana withdraw the point that no quorum voted?

Mr. WALLACE. There are two or three objections.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point?

Mr. WALLACE. If I withdraw my objection, there are other objections.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MATSON. I insist on my motion.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I hope that motion will not prevail. I think that this difficulty can be satisfactorily fixed up so that we can go on with our business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee must proceed in order; and the present occupant of the chair will not permit business to be transacted in any other way. Whatever the result as to this particular pension bill may be, the committee must preserve the order and dignity of its proceedings.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MATSON, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WALLACE] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, no 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana insist on his point that no quorum voted?

Several MEMBERS. The point is not renewed.

Mr. WALLACE. I insist.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the roll to be called, in accordance with the rule.

Mr. LAWLER. I understood that gentlemen were willing this bill should be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put that question to the committee, and objection was made.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. MATSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

And further, that the committee, having under consideration a bill (S. 2132) granting a pension to Fridoline Glastetter, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of the roll shows 98 members present and 125 members absent.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House do now adjourn, as it is evident we can not do any further business. [Cries of "No."] No further motion is in order except there be a call of the House. We are only punishing ourselves to stay here.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 10, 1886.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.
Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and after proceeding for some time read the following entry:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER providing that the doors shall not be closed during the discussion of executive nominations,

When

Mr. HARRIS raised a question of order, namely, that the resolution proposed an amendment to the standing rules of the Senate and that the provisions of Rule XL prescribing the mode of amendment to the rules were not complied with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore sustained the point of order; and Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask that the Journal be corrected in respect to that resolution. I can not understand why the President of this body shall have the right to direct that a resolution shall lie on the table. There is a very wide distinction, if the Chair will allow me to state it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to correct the Journal when the reading of it is concluded. The Senator will wait until the reading of the Journal is completed, and then a motion can be made to correct it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well, sir, I will wait.

The reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was resumed and concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Virginia is now in order. The attention of the Chair has been called to the entry in the Journal. The Chair simply announced that the resolution would lie on the table. That was the mere announcement of an existing fact; but if the Senator desires any other disposition of the resolution than that indicated by the Chair, it is now in order to submit the matter.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not understand it, perhaps. I should like to be exactly right about it. If the Chair shall designate that the resolution shall lie upon the table, then I can not make a motion to take it from the table and debate that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly the Senator can call it up. It is in the most favorable possible condition for consideration by lying on the table.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But the motion is not debatable, and my purpose in offering the resolution, I am frank to state, was to get a matter before the Senate that might be debatable. I do not think, with all deference to the Chair, that it is his prerogative to lay the resolution upon the table; it must be done by a motion from the floor. I ask pardon if I am mistaken, but I think to lay a resolution upon the table must be done by a motion from the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of any motion, the Chair always lays the pending question upon the table; but if the Senator desires to submit a motion now, it will be entered and brought up at the proper time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Chair will permit me, my understanding was that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] raised the point of order that my resolution was not in order because it did not give a day's notice, yet the resolution itself had been presented here the day before. Now, if the resolution is laid upon the table on the third day, I can not fail to understand that I must make a motion to take it from the table; and the resolution was laid on the table, as I understand the reading of the Journal, by the dictation of the Chair and not by any motion that proceeded from the floor. I say this respectfully. Of course such a disposition of the resolution defeats the whole motive and purpose I had in offering the resolution.

If the Chair is certain that he is right in laying the resolution upon the table, then I understand the rule that applies to it, and I shall try to conduct myself accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again advise the Senator from Virginia that the announcement of the Chair is simply what was the fact, that in the absence of another motion the resolution would lie upon the table.

The Chair will state the matter to the Senator, so that there may be no controversy about it when the question comes up again. The Senator from Virginia seems to have misapprehended the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee. His point of order was not that notice had not been given, but that the resolution itself did not embody a reference to the rule that the Senator proposes to change and the precise phraseology that he proposes to insert. That is a point which can be supplied by the Senator at any time by simply giving notice as to where in the rules he desires an amendment to be made and the precise form of the amendment. The resolution is upon the table subject to call at any proper moment in the proceedings.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Chair receive two petitions at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to amend the Journal was made, but it is not insisted upon. The Journal will stand approved as read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DAYTON—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I herewith return without approval Senate bill No. 856, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio."

It is not claimed that the Government has any public department or business which it should quarter at Dayton, except its post-office and internal-revenue office. The former is represented as employing ten clerks, sixteen regular and two substitute letter-carriers, and two special-delivery employés, who I suppose are boys only occasionally in actual service. I do not understand that the present post-office quarters are either insufficient or inconvenient. By a statement prepared by the present postmaster it appears that they are rented by the Government for a period of ten years from the 15th day of October, 1883, at an annual rent of $2,950, which includes the cost of heating the same.

The office of the internal-revenue collector is claimed to be inadequate, but I am led to believe that this office is fairly accommodated at an annual rental of $900. It is not impossible that a suggestion to change the area of this revenue district may be adopted which would relieve any complaint of inadequacy of office room.

With only these two offices to provide for, I am not satisfied that the expenditure of $150,000 for their accommodation as proposed by this bill is in accordance with sound business principles or consistent with that economy in public affairs which has been promised to the people.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 9, 1886.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook, which was returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate yesterday upon a motion to reconsider. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The bill was recalled on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and he is not in his seat now. I suppose probably the motion to reconsider will be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the ordinary way. It will lie on the table or be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better lie on the table until the Senator who asked for the return of the bill comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made in the absence of objection.

Mr. CONGER. Being laid on the table, it is placed in a position where it can be reached when the Senator from Kansas comes in.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7087) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of the purchase-money on the sale of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, which has been returned from the House of Representatives in accordance with the request of the Senate made yesterday. The bill will lie upon the table, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], upon whose motion the bill was recalled, is absent.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of December 18, 1885, certain information as to claims on file in the Department for moieties or shares of penalties under the internal-revenue laws. This letter is quite lengthy, containing many details. If there be no objection, with the accompanying papers, it will be referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the board of Army officers convened to consider the subject of the acceptance of a site on Lake Michigan near Chicago, Ill., tendered as a gift to the United States by the Commercial Club of that city for military purposes, and requesting such legislation as will authorize the Government to accept the same; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I report back sundry veto messages of the President of the United States on pension bills from the Committee on Pensions, and submit reports thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be stated.

A bill (S. 1400) granting a pension to William H. Beck; and A bill (S. 2186) granting a pension to Louis Melcher.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it proposed to have the bills placed on the Calendar?

Mr. BLAIR. Let them be placed on the Calendar and the reports printed. In all cases the report is in favor of the passage of the bill, the veto of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bills will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether those cases have been considered by the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. All the vetoed cases were referred to the committee——

Mr. KENNA. I understand that they were referred to the committee, but I ask the Senator whether they have been considered by the committee?

Mr. BLAIR. I am about to answer the Senator's question, but I do not talk with that rapidity which enables me to do so without pausing. I was proceeding to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. KENNA. I presume the Senator has his own time in which to do so. I have no disposition to hurry him.

Mr. BLAIR. I was saying that all these veto messages were referred to the committee for its action. Thereupon the committee considered the matter and made this order:

Ordered, That the several veto messages of the President be referred respectively to the members of the committee who reported the bills vetoed, with instructions to examine and report the same back to the Senate, submitting any questions to the committee for advice and re-examination which they think necessary, and that any member of the minority of the committee have leave to present dissenting views.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask the Senator whether there was a quorum of the committee present when that order was made?

Mr. BLAIR. When that order was made there were two members actually present.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me answer the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a question of order. The Senator from New Hampshire will pause.

Mr. HOAR. My question of order is that it is not competent to demand the proceedings of a committee except so far as they are reported by the committee itself.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon a matter of that kind which members of the committee or others have seen fit to give to the papers, and which has entered into this controversy in a way which is designed to reflect upon that member of the committee who is now speaking to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware that any such thing had happened.

Mr. BLAIR. I was aware of it.

Mr. KENNA. So far as I am concerned I have made no reflections upon anybody; but I should like to know, and I desire every Senator to know——

Mr. BLAIR. I desire every one to know.

Mr. KENNA. Whether that was the report of the committee or not.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order is withdrawn; and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I have read the order of the committee under which action was taken on these vetoes. There were present in the committee at the moment when the order was dictated to the clerk two members, myself and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER]. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE], who was absent on some other committee, had sent me word that for the purposes of a quorum and the action of the committee I should consider him present. I afterward notified the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] of the action of the committee, and the clerk was instructed to notify other members if he had the opportunity. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] requested me to examine the cases which had been vetoed and which were originally reported by himself, as he had not the time nor the strength to attend to them; whereupon I proceeded to examine every one carefully that I have undertaken to report to the Senate. Every member of the committee had the opportunity to be there. If the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] was not aware of the order of the committee, he might find a possible excuse in the infrequency of his attendance upon the proceedings of that committee. The whole matter has been proceeded with in accordance with custom, and with the utmost design to be candid and square with everybody concerned.

Mr. VEST. What is the motion now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to place the bills reported upon the Calendar with the messages of the President and the reports of the committee. That order will be made as a matter of course unless objection is made.

Mr. CAMDEN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia rise to address the Chair on this question?

Mr. CAMDEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I am directed to present the views of certain members of the Committee on Pensions in relation to Senate Report No. 1424, signed by HENRY W. BLAIR for the committee, which assumes to be the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions on the veto messages of twenty-three pension bills by the President. I will read the views of the members of the committee herewith submitted, which will explain themselves:

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Pensions, beg leave to state that they had no knowledge of the report, nor have they any knowledge of any order, resolution, or action of said committee authorizing the report (S. No. 1424) signed by "HENRY W. BLAIR, for the committee," reviewing the vetoes of the President on twenty-three pension bills and animadverting upon the same.

The undersigned are justified in the inference that said report was not the authorized expression of the Committee on Pensions, from the fact that it is well known by the proceedings of this body that two additional members of that committee were absent from the Senate at the date of said alleged report and are still absent from the Senate. This fact induces the belief that said report, which condemns with such indiscriminate severity the objections made in the vetoes of the President in the various cases referred to, is simply the views and report of Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR, of said committee, and is not the authorized views and report of said committee.

An order purports to have been adopted by said committee on the 29th of June referring the veto messages of the President respectively to the subcommittee who reported the said bills; each subcommittee to examine and report the same back to the Senate upon the objections of the President to each bill, each subcommitteeman to take charge of the bills which he originally reported to the Senate. In our judgment this was the proper course to pursue, for every veto should be judged by its own merits—as the facts justified in each case. We are clearly of the opinion that the manner in which the President's objections to the various bills referred to have been disposed of by said alleged report is unauthorized and highly objectionable. No general terms of dissent and criticism, it would seem, were proper in reviewing the President's objections, for which in the case of each veto he had assigned specific reasons.

The undersigned, in the most emphatic manner, disavow all responsibility for said report, its language, sentiments, and its conclusions. We regard the tone and substance of the report as unwarranted by any action of the committee. In our opinion the President's reasons for the vetoes referred to do not call for the gross criticism or censure of this body. From the weight of the objections offered by the President to each bill he has felt himself constrained to veto we might find ample justification for what has been so unsparingly denounced in said alleged report. We do not find in any of the vetoes under review anything that indicates, on the part of the President, a want of justice or proper sympathy in the bestowment of honors or rewards on our soldiers; we believe he has desired to mete out justice in all cases of meritorious claims submitted to him, and we will not add to the censure of the so-called report by attempting to prove that the President is in proper sympathy with all proper means and measures which attest the appreciation felt by the country for its defenders.

But we can not perceive the merits of the reasoning that would discriminate in favor of a pension bill by any legal or moral requirement, because the object of such a bill is to reward a soldier, or provide for a member of his family. There can be no justification, either for the President or a member of this body, in bestowing a benefaction when the law and the facts do not justify it. Next to the injustice and ingratitude of totally ignoring the patriot soldier, who held his life as a willing sacrifice for his country, would be the heedless and indiscriminate lavishing of bounties which rank the pretender and undeserving with the deserving hero. The brave and devoted soldier must regard every reward bestowed upon the undeserving as an injustice and a disparagement to himself.

The undersigned would protest against the report as unauthorized, and against the unmerited censure which has been bestowed upon the President in the alleged report referred to, for no other reason, so far as we can see, than that he has seen fit honestly, conscientiously, and with a faithful regard for the public interest to exercise his constitutional prerogative in discriminating between the deserving and undeserving in bestowing pensions.

J. N. CAMDEN.
A. H. COLQUITT.
E. K. WILSON.
W. C. WHITTHORNE.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator now permit me a question? Allow me to ask him if any of the signers of that report ever examined a single one of these pension cases, either before or after the veto, or knows anything about them?

Mr. CAMDEN. The committee has not considered them. They have not been before the committee so far as I know.

Mr. BLAIR. I can answer my question more definitely than the Senator does.

Mr. CAMDEN. I have only examined the record.

Mr. BLAIR. There was not one of these bills reported by a member of the political minority of the committee. No one of the political minority of the committee, so far as I know or believe, ever examined the bills or evidence originally or since the veto messages, or has any knowledge whatever upon the subject of the merits of the claims to which they allude. If the Senator thinks otherwise or believes otherwise or has himself any personal knowledge, I should be glad to have him state it.

Mr. CAMDEN. I will state to the Senator that I was present in the committee-room on Tuesday, the 29th of June, at which time the order purports to have been made referring these cases to subcommittees. There was no other person in the committee-room. The clerk told me that one or two members had been in there, but had gone away, and that the chairman was engaged on some other committee.

Mr. BLAIR. That was the day, as the Senator knows——

Mr. CAMDEN. So far as I am concerned, or the members who signed the minority report which I have read, they did not know that such a report was in contemplation, and they knew nothing about it.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has not answered my question. I asked the Senator if he or any other member of the committee, who has signed the paper which he read as the views of the minority, knows anything of the merits of the cases that were vetoed?

Mr. CAMDEN. We claim that we represent the views of the majority; that there was no expression of the committee on the subject.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand the Senator. I ask him if he or any member of the committee who signed that paper has examined any one of these vetoed cases?

Mr. CAMDEN. So far as I know they never had an opportunity of doing so; they never knew anything about it.

Mr. BLAIR. Can the Senator deny that they had the opportunity when these cases were all examined and disposed of at regular meetings of the committee?

Mr. KENNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask whether it is in order now to move to recommit the matter to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that such a motion would be in order.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to submit that motion, to recommit the reports and all papers touching the reports and the bills and veto messages, in each case, to the Committee on Pensions for the consideration of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the several reports referred to be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. Upon that motion I desire to say that these vetoes came to the committee in the usual way and have been pending there some considerable time; that at a regular meeting of the committee this order was made, and that members of the committee who were not present were notified of the making of the order.

In the nature of things the examination of these papers would not be made by the mass of the committee, and the several vetoes were sent to those members of the committee who had made the original reports. We followed the usual method of investigation, with instructions that if members of the subcommittee saw fit or if any question arose it should be presented to the full committee for instructions; otherwise with instructions to report the veto messages back to the Senate.

I have stated the position in which they were examined. I have also stated the fact that the order which has been read to the Senate left the matter entirely open to any member of the committee who was dissat's-fied or saw fit to examine the reports to submit the views of the minority. The papers are still in the possession of the committee, and they have been there all the time.

If there is anything further that the committee can do in regard to the matter, I do not know it. There is a great amount of labor involved in these cases. We have done all we could in regard to the reports and veto messages, and I object to recommitting them.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that these reports ought to be recommitted to the committee. The proceedings of the committee are certainly irregular. When we act upon a case of this kind I think we are entitled to have the judgment of the entire committee or at least a quorum of the committee. I am quite prepared myself to take up and discuss some of these questions at any time with reference to the President's veto, and I can discuss them without reference to the report of the committee on the facts that are in the case; but I think as a matter of propriety these cases ought to go back to the committee and the committee ought to bring them here in a way in which there can be no question about them.

For that reason I shall vote to recommit the reports to the committee, with the expectation that the chairman will then assemble the committee, or if the committee refuse to assemble, that the matter will there lie, and the responsibility must be with those who refuse to come to make up a quorum.

Mr. KENNA. In submitting the motion I had in view precisely what has been indicated by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will pause for a moment. The Chair must remind the Senate that a motion to recommit, although now entered and now debatable, will be entered in these several cases on the Calendar, and that will be the first thing to be discussed when the cases come up in order.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that; but as two Senators have been heard, I ask that I may be heard for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. KENNA. I wish in submitting the motion simply to secure the consideration by at least a quorum of the committee of these cases, and that the Senate may have the benefit of the views of a quorum of the committee when they come to act finally upon this subject. No matter how it happened (and I am not disposed at this time to animadvert upon motives), it appears from the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire himself that what purports to be the report by the committee, which indulges in great severity of language in reference to the President's action in dealing with a large number of these cases, is the action of two members of a committee of nine.

We have not even the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire that this report ever saw the eyes of more than two members of the committee, and it seems to me that in any case, under the circumstances, the Senate would not hesitate to recommit to the committee matters which require the attention and on which the Senate is entitled to the attention of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I prefer to cut this whole matter short by asking that the motion to recommit be agreed to, and I give notice to every member of the committee that we shall take this matter up at the regular meeting next Tuesday morning, and I hope there will be a full attendance of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the various messages, bills, and reports referred to will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 578) for the relief of Emma J. Halloway;
A bill (H. R. 887) granting a pension to Thomas S. Duvall;
A bill (H. R. 4265) granting a pension to Josiah Mahoney;
A bill (H. R. 7418) granting a pension to Emily Threadgill;
A bill (H. R. 8057) for the relief of Theodore Dunmire;
A bill (H. R. 8150) granting a pension to Jesse Campbell;
A bill (H. R. 8352) for the relief of Levi A. Cronkhite;
A bill (H. R. 8635) granting a pension to Irene Googins;
A bill (H. R. 8963) granting a pension to Michael Fitzpatrick;
A bill (H. R. 9052) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John F. Morris; and
A bill (H. R. 9457) granting a pension to Martin V. Curry.

The above eleven pension bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2343) supplemental to an act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1436) for the relief of H. M. Jones, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2829) granting a pension to James Nobles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2830) granting an increase of pension to Edward Leahy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. It is for the construction of a railroad bridge, and is in accordance with the requirements of the Engineer Department.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am authorized by the same committee to report Senate bill 2262 and recommend its indefinite postponement. It is a Senate bill relating to the same subject as the House bill just passed.

The bill (S. 2262) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, was postponed indefinitely.

SEIZURES OF AMERICAN VESSELS IN FOREIGN WATERS.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call up the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to the call of the Senator from Massachusetts of his resolution the Calendar is now in order. Whenever the resolution is produced it will be reported. It is not now here.

Mr. CONGER. I hope we shall go on with the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. This is the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is now in the possession of the Secretary, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, so far as in his opinion it may not be inconsistent with the public interest, to inform the Senate of all facts in his possession or that of the Department of State in regard to the seizure or detention in any foreign ports of any American vessels, and the pretext or alleged cause for such seizure, and all correspondence relating to the same, and what efforts have been made to procure redress for such seizures and to prevent the recurrence thereof.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to amend that by inserting after the words "any American vessels" the words "since January 1, 1886."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

A MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Clark, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8950) to remove the political disabilities of Francis Sorrell, of Roanoke County, Virginia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1666) granting a pension to Edward Corning, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 199) providing for printing eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Michael Hahn; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

COLLISION SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be stated under the special rule made a few days ago.

The bill (S. 4) to permit the owners of certain vessels, and the owners or underwriters of cargoes laden thereon, to sue the United States, was announced as first in order on the Calendar; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been heretofore read in full, if there be no objection and no amendment——

Mr. EVARTS. There was an amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the owner or owners of any American ship or vessel engaged in or belonging to the United States merchant-marine service, and the owners or underwriters of the cargoes laden thereon, and the owners or underwriters of any property on board thereof, may, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to, sue the United States in any United States district court in which the parties so suing, or any of them, may reside, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such courts, for any damage, loss, or injury to such ship or vessel, or her owner or owners, or to the owners or underwriters of any cargo laden thereon, or of any property on board thereof, arising from or attributable to the mismanagement of any vessel owned by the United States, or to the negligence or want of skill of those in charge thereof, by collision; and the said district court is hereby authorized to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such injury, loss, or damage, if any shall be found due, against the United States, in favor of such owners or underwriters, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in the admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal that now exist by law in civil cases in which the United States are a party: Provided, however, That this act shall not extend to cases occurring prior to the passage hereof, nor in any case shall any such suit be brought more than six years after the collision shall have occurred.

SEC. 2. That the process or procedure by which such suits may or can be brought, and service on or notice to the United States or its officers shall be made or given, may be regulated by courts of admiralty by rules or orders made therein; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause the United States attorney in each district to appear for and defend the United States in any such suit brought in his district.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the bill, but I would suggest to the Senator from New York that there should be a proviso that all actions which may arise among different parties for the same collision or injury shall be consolidated in one. The United States should not be at the expense of meeting every single item of damage for all underwriters' cargoes.

Mr. EVARTS. I would say to the Senator from Michigan that the ordinary practice of admiralty courts is to require consolidation of that kind when there are different claimants, but it is hardly possible, I think, to preclude a suitor from bringing a suit merely because other and quite independent interests do not join; but the whole matter is plastic in the hands of the admiralty courts to guard against the multiplication of costs or suits.

Mr. CONGER. But this bill authorizes bringing the suit not in the admiralty courts, but in the Court of Claims, as I understand.

Mr. EVARTS. Oh, no; nothing but admiralty.

Mr. CONGER. Then I misunderstood the reading of the bill. Perhaps the rules of the admiralty courts could be made to accomplish the object which I desire. My impression was that this authorized suit to be brought in the Court of Claims.

Mr. EVARTS. No.

Mr. CONGER. Then I have no objection.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I will say a word about this bill. I ought not to insist upon its being presently heard if there are any objections; and as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] who is not now in his seat told me he would consider whether an objection that he made when it first came up would be renewed or not, I ask that this matter stand until Monday in the same shape as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally, subject to the same rule. The Chair hears no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER April 12, 1886, in relation to the consideration of executive business in open session was announced as the next business in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EVARTS. There is.

Mr. PLATT. I think that had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, being objected to, goes over.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all matters other than those relating to treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the present consideration of the resolution, it goes over.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is not a resolution which can be objected to. That is a resolution introduced by me some months ago; it comes up in its regular order on the Calendar. I ask information from the Chair if I am not correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now proceeding under a special order, which has been read several times, by which any objection passes over any business on the Calendar, leaving it on the Calendar. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] was understood as objecting to its consideration now.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from New York objected first.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Chair will excuse me, I did not hear the order under which we are proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again have the order read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That for the next six days of the legislative sittings of the Senate, after the call for and disposition of resolutions shall have been passed, the time remaining until half past 12 o'clock shall be devoted to the Calendar, beginning with the first case thereon, and every matter objected to shall be passed by, and debate shall be limited to five minutes for any Senator on the question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I believe we have five minutes' debate on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This being objected to, it is passed by under this rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does that resolution cover that which is on the Calendar, or does it cover new business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It covers everything on the Calendar.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I asked whether that resolution does not simply cover new business and not that which is on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Senator is through the Chair will endeavor to answer.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I mean to make myself as clear as I possibly can that you can not offer a resolution here up to your half past 12 o'clock which is not subject to objection; but is it to be construed from that order that business upon this Calendar remaining there since last April is to be beaten by a single objection? If that is the construction, then where and when am I to look for the rules of the Senate? I was told here yesterday morning by the Chair, on a suggestion proceeding from the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that I could not make a proposition here unless I had given a day's notice, and the Chair sustained the Senator from Tennessee. Here is a proposition pending that is Calendar business, that is a matter which has regularly gone on this Calendar, that has been discussed by the newspapers, that has been discussed by Senators on this floor. It was postponed because it was said that a Senator who was sick could not deliver himself of the remarks that he wanted to make, and he sent them here and had them read by another Senator. It was again——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again remind the Senator from Virginia that he is out of order. He has been twice reminded of that fact. The Chair must submit the question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not discussing the point of order, if the Chair pleases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir, with all due respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair state the decision from which an appeal is taken?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution came up in its regular order on the Calendar under the special rule under which the Senate is acting. Objection was made by the Senator from New York, and the Chair was proceeding to lay before the Senate the next case on the Calendar according to the rule. The Senator from Virginia insists that that is not in order, and appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RIDDDEBERGER. Again, Mr. President, that resolution was put over because the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was not here and he wanted to deliver himself of a speech. Since then he has done it; and his speech has gone to the country in yellow envelopes, sent everywhere.

What excuse can there be now for a refusal to vote upon this proposition? Sir, if I am asked to give a reason myself I can draw it from the lesson of yesterday, for I undertake to say that things which were uttered here in executive session yesterday——

Mr. INGALLS. I call the Senator to order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is debating a question upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. INGALLS. He has no right to quote what was said in executive session.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have not quoted it. Wait till I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas present a motion?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It will be quite time to call me to order then.

I am not one of those Senators who study words in order to affront gentlemen here and then take them from the RECORD the next morning. I say, sir, that I have proposed this resolution from the time I came here, and I ask Senators whether the time is ever to come when we can vote upon it. I want the country to know that we mean to determine at some time whether we ought to have secret sessions of this body or whether the nominations of the President of the United States shall be passed upon in open session.

I say again that there were words uttered here yesterday that no man would have uttered outside of an executive session of the Senate of the United States. I mean to impersonate nobody; but, sir, if you will assume for a moment that my name is John Smith, and that I was begotten and builded out of the smallest material in the United States or even in this world, I should not yet have been capable, in my judgment, of asserting before the Senate that I had a letter which declared that a certain man had dickered and traded, and yet be unwilling to produce the letter.

If I am out of order in saying that, then I am out of order, and let the Senator from Kansas call me to order. When I make an allegation of that sort in executive session, then I shall be out of order under a higher rule than obtains in this Senate.

I ask now, as I propose to ask at every opportunity that shall present itself, for a vote upon this proposition, standing as it does upon the Calendar, ruled out as it has been since, I think, about the 9th day of April last, I might almost say kicked out. Senators have spoken upon it, and we were asked to let it pass by because somebody was sick; and now it is up for a vote; and why can we not vote upon it?

Sir, I can understand further that a man is willing to make a contest in executive session that he is not willing to make openly before the public. I do not mean to say that there is any one Senator here who makes that sort of dispute or that kind of distinction; but I mean to say that it is not proper or right. It is due to men whose names are sent here for confirmation that they should have the public know what charges are brought against them and how they are sustained.

Mr. President, this is under the five-minute rule, as I understand it, and I will control myself. I will take it for granted that John Smith is before this body for confirmation and that I am to determine on testimony taken by a committee whether he is fit and qualified for the office. I will assume that he comes here and answers negatively what is affirmatively charged against him. I will assume for the purposes of what I want to state here that there comes from Massachusetts a Senator by the name of Brown. I will assume for the purposes of what I want to state that there is a Senator coming from Virginia by the name of Smith, and then I will assert that neither of them, Brown nor Smith, would have dared to say in the open sessions of the Senate about somebody else that which was said in executive session yesterday. They would not have dared to face the doctor from Southampton—and if that is objectionable I will name him as from Northampton, in order to preserve executive secrets. They would not have dared to bring into the Senate such a statement as was made here. I ask pardon; I withdraw that statement, because I am afraid I am getting a little over the line. They would not have dared to say in open session of this body what I know has been stated in the secret and executive sessions. They never dared to state even in executive session that a certain man was not qualified for the office, that he had not the character that qualified him for the associations of the office, and I could see in that their character, but Bell-telephone stock was disporting itself around this Capitol and trying to make it appear that a man——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a question of order. He will state it.

Mr. HOAR. My question of order is that this appeal is not debatable. It being an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a question itself undebatable, it therefore should be decided without debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I submit that that is not correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will pause a moment. The Chair is perfectly aware that the appeal is not debatable, having been made upon a question that is not debatable; as if a Senator should make a motion to adjourn and an appeal should be taken from a decision of the Chair arising on the question of adjournment, it is clear it would not be in order for any one to debate that question. The Chair has not felt disposed to enforce the rule against the Senator from Virginia; but if the Senator from Massachusetts makes the point of order, the Chair will be compelled to rule that the Senator from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. We are all very impatient to get at the Calendar, and I think we should not have a long debate on taking up a matter on the Calendar out of its place. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator, however.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is a question whether the Senator will allow me to proceed. I hope he will not object. I shall soon be through.

Mr. HOAR. How long does the Senator expect to take.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not know. I have a few things to say. I shall not be long.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive the question of order for the time being on the request of the Senator from Virginia in order that he may conclude his remarks, but I hope we shall be able to proceed with the business of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I see that the Senate is impatient to get to the Calendar to pass bills that make appropriations, I suppose river and harbor bills and a great many other things. I do not want to be the obstacle in the way of passing money appropriation bills; I do not want to be in the way of raising the revenue that is to be derived from the bills which the country wants passed; but I have just this to say, and it will be all that I shall say now, allegations have been made, seemingly sustained by the words of a Senator, which I challenge and say are not true. I mean by that that a Senator from Vermont or a Senator from anywhere else who might by possibility assert that he had letters inculpating Joe Brown or John Smith or anybody else with the dicker and the sale of offices uttered that which is unbecoming a man and is not true. I say that, sir, for the man himself, and I need not say it for myself.

I say more than that. I say that it is shown by a public record like this (exhibiting a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) that a Solicitor-General under Grant's administration recognized that he had made what was considered a mistake in not referring a certain document to the Secretary of the Interior, and then referred it to the Secretary of the Interior, who sent it back, and said that for the public good a suit ought to be instituted in the interest of the American people and in the name of the United States only, and he did. He was forbidden to come upon this floor, but the Bell Telephone Company was here. I know it, and if other Senators do not know it it is not my fault.

Mr. President, I want to do that which I think is just to myself. The man for whom I am speaking here in a way does not need it and perhaps would perfer that I should not say a word. I want this resolution voted upon because it will give a man like him an opportunity of being heard here as well as the possible owners of Bell-telephone stock on this floor.

There is quite a difference between a man coming here representing a constituency—and we can take up the census reports of 1860 and since and see what the increase in the value of the property in his State amounts to—and a man who comes here and compares his own stock at the value of the constituency that is behind him. That is the way this thing began yesterday and the way it ended. Twenty-eight to twenty-five is a public record this morning—twenty-eight to twenty-five was the record yesterday when the yeas and nays were called. I know it, and other Senators here know it; but the influence which was brought to bear—Mr. President, if I get out of order you will have to call time again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia was reminded several times that he was out of order in referring to proceedings elsewhere.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask you to call me to order every time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not call the Senator to order. He has violated the rules of order on several occasions this morning.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I think I have been almost constantly reminded of that fact.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the rule read for the proceeding of the Senate when the Chair has made a ruling that a Senator is out of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Senator will withdraw his point I have said nearly all I want to say. I know of course that if you put a coal on the back of a terrapin he will continue to crawl.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will pause. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to have the rule read?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the reading of the rule.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

Mr. HOAR. Let the rule be read, and then proceed with the Calendar.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXXVI.

Executive sessions—

Mr. HOAR. No; the rule I refer to is that for the proceeding of the Senate when the Chair holds a Senator to be out of order. He can then only proceed with the leave of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia has resumed his seat.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then I waive the reading of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be proceeded with.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 2157) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must submit the question of the appeal made by the Senator from Virginia. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I believe that is on the question of taking a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the appeal.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I withdraw the appeal, and ask now that the vote be taken on the resolution for open sessions, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been passed by. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

OBSTRUCTIVE DEPOSITS IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The bill (S. 2157) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York city, by dumping or otherwise, and to punish and prevent such offenses, and making other provisions in connection therewith, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MILLER. One word of explanation.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to the consideration of that.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not.

Mr. MILLER. It is a very important measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 780) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States was announced as next in order.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 6, after the words "passing a," to strike out "successful" and insert "satisfactory;" so as to read:

That medical officers of the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no person shall be so appointed until after passing a satisfactory examination in the several branches of medicine, surgery, and hygiene before a board of medical officers of the said service.

Mr. VEST. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over under the rule.

Mr. McMILLAN. Who objects to the bill?

Mr. VEST. I want to examine it. I supported the bill in committee, but I have heard statements about it since which lead me to desire to examine it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be passed over without prejudice. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Maryland who sits next to him [Mr. GORMAN] has an amendment to offer, and that amendment I am advised ought to be inserted at the end of the bill. I understand the objection of the Senator from Maryland is removed by the acceptance of his amendment.

Mr. VEST. I do not know that I am against the bill; but the Senator from Maryland spoke to me about it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be passed over without prejudice, so that it can be called up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally.

Mr. MILLER. I simply rise for information. As I understand it, under the rule that we are now acting when a bill is objected to it goes over informally. It does not lose its place or change its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at all.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The word "informally" is not in the resolution as I read it a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If a Senator objects positively, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do object positively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But in either case the bill does not lose its place on the regular Calendar.

Mr. MILLER. It retains the same position on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to a motion to take it up.

Mr. McMILLAN. My request was that it should be passed over informally and retain its place under the present call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is their objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Minnesota that this bill be passed over informally subject to the rule?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to its being considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over. The next case will be stated.

ADJUSTMENT OF STATE CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it is worth while to attempt to press that under the five-minute rule of debate, though it is in my charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

TAXATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator who makes the report in that case [Mr. ALDRICH] not being present, I desire that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 125) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis was announced as next in order.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not wish this taken up just at the moment when we are about to pass to another order of business. I ask that it may stand until Monday without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, it will be passed over informally.

ANDREW T. M'REYNOLDS.

The consideration of the bill (S. 2217) for the relief of Andrew T. McReynolds was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on a motion heretofore made to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the bill will not be recommitted.

The motion to refer was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL F. GARRETT.

The bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garrett was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing the name of Samuel F. Garrett, late a private in Company I, Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

Mr. VEST. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL May 11, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garrett, have examined the same, and report as follows:

This soldier entered the service July 4, 1861, and was honorably discharged July 9, 1865. Through exposure and hard service he claims to have contracted chronic diarrhea and inflammatory sore eyes while in the line of duty, and in November, 1879, applied for pension. This claim was rejected in January, 1884, upon the ground "that there has been no pensionable disability from alleged causes since discharge."

An examination of the papers in the case, however, discloses the evidence to be abundant that the claimant was, and is, greatly disabled. His father's family physician testifies to his robust health and entire freedom from disease prior to his enlistment, and the War Department records show that he was treated for the disabilities alleged in the Government hospitals.

The following brief extracts from the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions set forth other and undisputed testimony to the same effect, while the Department examiner, R. G. Charles, gives his recommendation for allowing the claim:

"His officers and comrades testify to his having chronic diarrhea in November, 1861, and sore eyes in 1863, and that he never recovered from either disability during his service. His neighbors, who have known him from boyhood, testify to the continuance of the diseases from the time of discharge, in 1865, up to the present. Drs. Grinnell, Graham, Stephenson, and Connell, skillful and reputable physicians, bear positive testimony to his disabled condition from the causes alleged.

"Notwithstanding the rejection of this claim by the Department, the Department examiner, R. G. Charles, recommended its allowance in the following words:

"'From my examination of all the evidence in this case, I am of the opinion that the claim should be admitted for chronic diarrhea and inflammation of eyes. I think that claimant has been disabled for performing manual labor during the years from 1863 to 1882 in degree one-half.'

"All of the witnesses testifying in support of the claim are of the highest character and best standing, and all of them have lived in the same community with the claimant since his birth."

This committee think the facts and evidence sufficient to warrant the claim, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Before we reach the hour at which the rule ceases, I ask unanimous consent that we continue the Calendar until 1 o'clock under this rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to consider the Calendar under the present order until 1 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the question is on House bill 1840.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12.30 having arrived——

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce, in section 1, to insert the clauses from line 1134 to line 1174, inclusive, as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not necessary to read the amendment again. I think we were about to vote on the amendment known as the Hennepin Canal amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way, and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

For the construction of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, in the State of Illinois, to the Mississippi River, at or above the mouth of Rock River, in said State, together with such feeders and other works that may be necessary to supply said canal with water, $300,000. Said canal shall be known as the Illinois and Mississippi River Canal, and shall be constructed on such route as may be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and feeders, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and in such proceedings said court shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois, so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use: Provided further, That said canal shall be 80 feet wide at the water-line and 7 feet deep, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and all other erections and fixtures that may be necessary for safe and convenient navigation of said canal and branch as specified in said survey.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very short time with a few remarks upon this proposition. The great importance of this work and its great value to the commerce of the Northwest has been placed before the Senate in a very clear and to my mind conclusive manner by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and I can not undertake to add to the demonstration made in his speech regarding this whole question.

I know, Mr. President, that there is a great difference of opinion in the country regarding this work. There is, of course, a difference of opinion on this question in the State of New York. But so far as I have become acquainted with the opinion of the commercial bodies of New York, that portion of our citizens who have given the subject of internal improvements much attention, I think I am justified in saying that there is little difference of opinion, and that as a rule they believe this to be a very important work, and one which should be undertaken by the General Government.

INSTRUCTED BY THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the assembly and senate of the State of New York, January 29, 1885, when this measure was before the Senate at that time, which I read:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE, Albany, January 29, 1885.

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be respectfully requested to urge the passage of an appropriation of $300,000 to aid in the construction of the Michigan and Mississippi (Hennepin) Canal in the river and harbor bill now before Congress.

This resolution is indorsed as having passed the assembly on the 29th day of January, 1885, and also indorsed as having passed the senate upon the same day, and it is properly attested and signed by the clerks of the two bodies. That resolution was passed after due consideration by the Legislature of New York. It was passed, if I remember correctly, without much opposition to it.

The commercial bodies of several of the principal cities of New York did at this time in 1885 send here resolutions similar to this, indorsing the measure and asking the representatives of the State of New York to vote for the appropriation; and I believe that this resolution presents the best judgment of the commercial bodies and commercial men of my own State.

New York having constructed with its own moneys the Erie Canal, having expended upon that canal in round numbers $60,000,000, and now having made it free to the commerce of the country, maintaining it free at an expense of about three-quarters of a million dollars per annum, for which a tax is levied upon the property of the entire State, and having during the last session of the present Legislature of the State made an appropriation of $200,000 to go on with the work of doubling the length of the locks in the Erie Canal, it is very natural that our people should turn with much interest to an enterprise in the Northwest which they believe will do very much toward increasing the amount of traffic which shall pass through our canal and seek a foreign market through the great port of the city of New York. We believe that this canal would do for the country lying west of it, the great wheat-producing region of America, substantially what the Erie Canal has done and is now doing for all the country which lies west of it.

We were told here the other day by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the day of canals had passed, and that the age of the iron rail had come, and that works of this kind were antiquated and out of date, and could be made of no value to our people. The returns of freight carried by the Erie Canal during the past ten years lend no proof to that statement, but absolutely disprove it. The amount of freight carried over the Erie Canal for the past few years has varied but very little, being from five to six million tons per annum. Last year it was less than the year before, but it was not as much less as the amount of freights carried by the great trunk lines of the country was. Business was depressed then, trade was dull, business was dull, and every great trunk line of this country lost very much in its tonnage, or at least in its receipts.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I have the honor to be a member, made an investigation of this matter a year ago, and if the Senate will turn to the testimony taken by that committee it will find one statement made by every leading railroad man who was brought before it when questioned in regard to the effects of water transportation, and particularly in regard to the effects of the maintenance of the Erie Canal. Mr. Blanchard said to that committee that the Erie Canal was the absolute regulator and controller of the freight rates of all the produce of the West seeking a market in the East; that it controlled the rates for carrying grain and produce just as absolutely upon the Grand Trunk line, and upon the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Pennsylvania, and the Chesapeake and Ohio as it did upon the New York Central Railroad, which runs alongside the Erie Canal.

Mr. President, if you will go over the railroad rates of the country to see the rates that are charged on the transportation of grain and farm produce from the West to the East you will find that that statement made by Mr. Blanchard is undoubtedly correct, and that to-day the Erie Canal is the only power which is controlling and regulating the freight rates of this country. Were it not for the beneficent influence of the Erie Canal exerted to-day, and the influence which it has exerted upon the commerce of this country in the growth and development of the West for the past quarter of a century, we should not to-day, in my judgment, be sending to Liverpool either a bushel of grain or a ton of farm produce of any kind. We could not to-day compete in that market with India and with Russia in the disposition of wheat and other farm products were it not for the low rate of freight prevailing upon the great lakes and their extension, the Erie Canal.

CANALS TO BE BUILT HEREAFTER BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. President, the State of New York, having expended, as I have said, $60,000,000 to build and maintain this great highway free to all, believes it has a right to ask the Federal Government, in the changed condition of affairs which has taken place, to come to her aid. By this remark I mean to be understood as saying that all these great works must hereafter be built by the Federal Government, that no individual State will ever again undertake them; and the policy of their construction and their maintenance by the Federal Government is undoubtedly settled for all time to come. I believe it to be a wise settlement; I believe that all these great works should be undertaken, should be constructed, and should be maintained by the Federal Government. So I hold to-day that the Federal Government ought to come forward and aid the State of New York in maintaining the Erie Canal free, that it ought to come forward and voluntarily aid that State in the enlargement of the canal, in the deepening of its waters, and in the lengthening of its locks. The Federal Government to-day ought to appropriate for the benefit of the State of New York, in my judgment, at least three-quarters of the annual cost of the maintenance of the Erie Canal. The State of New York has not yet asked it, but I believe the day is not far distant when the State of New York will ask it and will demand of the Federal Government that it shall make annually, year by year, proper appropriations for the maintenance of this canal free, and that it shall make proper appropriations for its enlargement and improvement.

Mr. President, I stated that I believed the change of system under which we are now operating, whereby the Federal Government is to construct and maintain all works of internal improvement of national importance, is a wise change in our system. The separate States of our Union have not the machinery of government by which they can properly construct and carry on great internal improvements. It is true many of the older States of the Union have done it; but I venture the assertion here and now that no State of this Union ever undertook and carried on for any length of time any great work of internal improvement which did not sooner or later result in bringing great scandal and corruption in the State government. These great works in the States have always been made the football of politics. They have furnished the bulk of the patronage to the party that might happen to be in control of the State government; and thus it has been that in New York we have had our canal scandals from the earliest inception of the work down to the present time, and the State has had to change its constitution in order to prevent fraud and corruption.

Many of the other States of the Union that undertook to build canals gave them up or sold them to private parties in order to get the works out of politics, and to prevent fraud and corruption.

In short, I hold that the States in their governments, in their organizations and administrations, are not well adapted to carrying on these great works. But when we come to the Federal Government we find that all the works of improvement have been taken charge of by the War Department, under the control of the board of Army engineers, a body of men whose professional knowledge and whose experience as engineers is not excelled, if equaled, by any body of men in the world. The public works of the improvement of our rivers and harbors and their maintenance are directly under the charge of the board of Army engineers, a body of men educated at the expense of the nation, holding their positions for life, entirely removed from politics and from the influences which come from the control of political parties.

NO SCANDAL EVER ATTACHED TO RIVER AND HARBOR EXPENDITURES.

In their administration of these great works, I think I speak the acknowledged truth when I say that up to the present time there has never been a scandal connected with the expenditure of any of the money appropriated in a river and harbor bill which has come under the control of the board of Army engineers. There may be a question as to the necessity of a particular work; there may be differences of opinion as to whether this or that appropriation in the river and harbor bill should be made; there may be differences regarding the question as to whether a certain work is of national importance or of local importance; but so far as I have been able to follow the history of the expenditures of these moneys under the board of Army engineers under the control of the Secretary of War, I think I speak what are the admitted facts when I repeat that up to the present time there has never been a scandal connected with the expenditure of any of these moneys.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from New York permit me to make a suggestion to him on that point?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I am informed by a high authority that there never has been an embezzlement, a defalcation, or the loss of one farthing of the public money expended by the Engineer Corps of the Army of the United States. I state this because I think it indicates the high sense of honor that ever pervades that department of the service of this Government.

Mr. MILLER. I am very glad to have the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana, because I know he has examined this question carefully and he undoubtedly speaks the facts in the case.

I refer to this simply to emphasize my position when I stated that I believed it was a wise change which had come about by which the various State governments were not likely hereafter to undertake any important public improvements, and that all these public improvements would hereafter be carried on and constructed by the Federal Government. It seems to me that the change has been wise and that in this one central authority we have a body of men who, upon thorough investigation and surveys as they are ordered to make them, and in their reports to Congress, are able to give information to the two Houses of Congress which can go to no other legislative body in the land.

Therefore, I believe that there will never be any change backward in this matter. I believe that if the Hennepin Canal is ever to be constructed it must be constructed by the Federal Government. The State of Illinois, in my judgment, looking upon the history of the past and the experience of its sister States in regard to these great internal improvements, will not undertake it, neither do I believe that it should be asked to undertake it, for if this great water way is constructed connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes the interests of commerce will demand that it shall be entirely free of tolls, and certainly the State of Illinois, after having done so much on the Illinois River, will not consent to go further in this matter.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. President, for a number of years we have been appropriating large sums of money for the improvement of the Mississippi River. We have built the jetties at its mouth, making it possible for the largest ocean ships to come in and to come up to the city of New Orleans. I believe this was a wise improvement. I believe that the money thus far expended has been wisely expended upon the jetties. Whether the money expended upon the mere improvement of the bed of the river has been so wisely expended, or not, I am not able to state. But it is no argument against this measure, it is no argument against this bill, to say that some experiments which have been tried on the Mississippi River have proved failures. This work of the improvement of harbors and rivers must necessarily be somewhat experimental. The engineers may make plans, they may make estimates, but when a new idea is to be put into operation it is impossible that any engineer, no matter how skillful, no matter how much experience he may have, shall be able to tell absolutely what will be the result when the work is finished.

When the idea of jetties was first brought forward there was no engineer either in this country or in Europe who would undertake to say upon his standing as an engineer just what the result would be; but various governments have made the experiment of jetties at the mouths of rivers and across the bars of harbors, and to-day that principle has been settled by experiment. We know and can tell to-day exactly what jetties will do; but when they were first started no man could foresee what the result would be; and so it may be that in the improvements of the Mississippi River some of the money has not produced the result desired and intended; but it was necessary that the experiment should be made, it was necessary that the theories and the ideas of the engineers on these questions should be tested, and they could be tested in no other way than by appropriations of money and by actual experiments made, and I have no doubt that the great skill and knowledge of our engineers will yet solve, if it has not already solved, the problem of the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River.

I said we had been appropriating money liberally to that great water way; and now the people living in the Northwest, a region which is developing more rapidly than any other portion of this, our land, and all the country and people lying east of it desire that there shall be a free water way from the great Mississippi River to the lakes, such as we now have from the lakes to the ocean. I believe that this canal, if constructed, will save to the producers of the Northwest its entire cost every year in the reduction of their freights.

Why, Mr. President, the improvement made in the Detroit River upon the Saint Clair flats, in deepening that channel and in enabling the lakes to be navigated by ships carrying more than 2,000 tons of freight, has so reduced the cost of transporting wheat and other produce from the lakes to the ocean that the yearly saving estimated by those who have gone over it carefully, comparing the present amount of freight thus transported and taking the rates that were paid upon the lakes and upon the railroads previous to that improvement—the saving to the farmers of the West upon the grain and produce carried over the lakes and through the Detroit River where the improvement was made amounts in round numbers to $50,000,000 per annum. And when those appropriations were made in the river and harbor bills, if there had been nothing else in the bills worthy of consideration, if all the balance of the money in those river and harbor bills had been lost to the people of this country, the appropriations for that one river would have been and have been of more value to the country than all the other appropriations that were made. And so I believe that if this Hennepin Canal shall be constructed it will save year by year to the grain producers of the West more than its entire cost.

COMPETITION WITH INDIA AND RUSSIA.

Mr. President, I believe it will be a very important step in the direction of maintaining our ability to compete with India and Russia in the wheat markets of Europe. We must have cheaper transportation for the wheat from Dakota and from Minnesota and from Iowa to New York than we have to-day, or we are to be driven out of the markets of Europe. I believe that the Hennepin Canal will do for the Northwest what the Erie Canal did for the West which lies just beyond its waters. Believing this, and feeling instructed as I am by the Legislature of my own State and by the petitions of a large number of the commercial bodies of my State, I do not hesitate to give my vote for this amendment and to urge upon those Senators whose States and whose sections of the country have been greatly benefited by the appropriations upon the Mississippi River and upon the Gulf and throughout the entire South and East to see in this a measure of justice to the people who live in the Northwest, and who have few rivers of their own which call for any improvement or for any appropriation upon the part of the Federal Government. This canal, in its results and its interests, is not a canal for Illinois alone; it is not a canal for Iowa alone; but it is a canal which is to benefit the entire section of the country lying beyond it and bordering upon the Mississippi River.

Mr. President, I believe that this amendment should command the earnest support of every man in this body who believes in developing the resources of our country.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not propose on this 10th day of July, when we ought to be looking to the probability of an adjournment at some time before the next session commences, and in a thin Senate, that seems to have lost its entire interest in a river and harbor bill, and with the thermometer somewhere between 80° and 90° in the Senate Chamber, to detain the Senate with any extended discussion of this measure. But as it is claimed that the construction of this Hennepin Canal is to result in a vastly cheaper price for the transportation of grain from the West to the East, I think perhaps I ought to express the reasons which determine me in giving my vote against this proposed amendment, and I will do so very briefly.

The first is that this river and harbor bill carries too much money already. I have strictly, since its consideration in the Senate, voted against increasing the aggregate amount of this river and harbor bill, and I believe in almost all instances in favor of decreasing the amounts wherever the committee has recommended that any decrease should be made. I think it is a great mistake for the Senate to increase this bill a dollar over the amount at which it came to us from the other House.

This administration is a Democratic administration. The Senate is all that is left to signify Republican administration of any sort in the United States. I am one of those who believe that in a matter of this sort, an expenditure for internal improvements, for rivers and harbors, those in power, those who have control of the administration should be permitted to set the amount which is to be expended. I find that the Democratic Secretary of War has submitted an estimate saying that in his judgment—which I suppose represents the executive branch of the Government—an appropriation of $10,000,000 is as much as ought to be made for this purpose during the coming fiscal year. He submits that in his estimates in the following words:

Improving rivers and harbors: Construction, completion, repair, preservation, and survey of harbors and rivers, to be expended upon such works as may be directed by Congress, submitted $10,000,000.

That is the estimate which comes to us from the Secretary of War; and now with reference to the specific items which are enumerated in this bill he appends a note, which I will read:

NOTE.—The following statement is not furnished as a part of the "annual estimates for the public service" required by the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., p. 370), to be furnished by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury, but is inserted as a convenient and customary summary of items taken from the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for the fiscal year 1885, showing, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1867 (14 Stat., p. 421), "the amount that can be profitably expended in the next fiscal year" on each of the uncompleted works mentioned.

And he then goes on and gives, not the estimates of the Chief of Engineers, for the Chief of Engineers does not estimate anything, but gives the amounts which the Chief of Engineers says can be profitably expended in the next fiscal year at the points where public improvements are being carried on, and those amounts aggregate $42,332,100. So the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, representing a Democratic administration, recommend to Congress to expend $10,000,000 for internal improvement during the next fiscal year. Then comes the House of Representatives, and I think I am not out of order in saying that this bill coming to us from that Democratic branch of this Government carried only the sum of $15,182,200, a much larger sum than I think under the circumstances ought to be appropriated during the next fiscal year for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

I am not speaking upon this question as an original question. I am not saying how much in my judgment ought to be expended by this Government for internal improvements; but I am saying that it is entirely proper to allow the administration in power to set the amount and to hold them responsible to the country for the amount which is set as proper to be expended.

The bill comes into the Senate with an aggregate addition made by the committee of this body, which as I said represents the last remnant of Republican government in the United States nationally, with an addition of $2,895,275, making the bill as reported to the Senate $18,077,475. That, if I am not mistaken, has been already increased by amendments which have been adopted here, so that the bill as it stands to-day, without the adoption of any further amendments increasing the bill, carries something over $18,200,000.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator if the bill has been increased by the action of the Senate since it was reported.

Mr. PLATT. I say that is what the bill carries as it stands to-day, if my figures have been correctly kept.

Mr. INGALLS. How much?

Mr. PLATT. About $18,200,000 in round numbers. The fact that the Senate ought not to increase the bill as it came from the House, the fact that it ought in my judgment to decrease it to the amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury at the instance of the Secretary of War would, if there were no other reason, control my vote in this matter.

I come now to my second reason for voting against this amendment. This is a work that, in my judgment, has no place upon a river and harbor bill. It is not the improvement of a river or a harbor. It is a work which, if it is worthy of being commenced by the Government, ought to be undertaken entirely distinct from these annual appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. I should suppose the friends of this measure would not want it put upon a river and harbor bill. What is this measure? It is a proposition which calls—I speak in round numbers now—for something like a final expenditure of $10,000,000. Possibly that is a little high; but taking either of the routes surveyed from the Mississippi to the Illinois River at Hennepin, and adding to the amount estimated for the completion of that portion of the work the amount which is proposed to be expended between Hennepin and the city of Chicago, the estimated expenditure comes somewhere in the neighborhood of between nine and ten million dollars; I think over $9,000,000.

I observe that nothing is estimated for the losses of people who may have water-power upon the Rock River, all the water of which practically is to be taken for a feeder for this canal; and all the business between Dixon and Rock Island or wherever the Rock River runs into the Mississippi River have rights which will have to be paid for if that water is taken away from them. I observe there is no estimate for that.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests that there will be no damages; but there is an immense water-power at Dixon which I understand is not interfered with; and as the river now stands there are plenty of opportunities for water-power between Dixon and the point where it runs into the Mississippi River. I imagine that the people entitled to the water-power will think that they are damaged at the towns below.

I say, then, it is an expenditure which on the face of it is to be some $10,000,000. What have we got in this bill? Three hundred thousand dollars. When is this work to be completed? If it is to be completed under the provisions of river and harbor bills from year to year, if $300,000 a year is to be expended, it will be completed in about thirty years. If by any means the friends of this measure could push the appropriations in the annual river and harbor bill up to a million dollars—and I suppose they can get more than that—it would be ten years before it could be completed. If a work of this magnitude is worthy to be undertaken by the Government—and I do not say it is not—it is simply wicked to attempt to complete it under the provisions of the annual river and harbor bill. We do not have a river and harbor bill passed every year, and so this work will have to be completed by driblets, completed at very much greater expense than is estimated, and very much greater expense than it could be completed for if it could be let as one contract and progress from the time of letting to the time of completion. I think I should not be out of the way in saying that if this enterprise can be constructed under contract for $10,000,000, as ordinary works are constructed, as a canal would be constructed, as a private enterprise, when it is constructed under the river and harbor bill, the appropriations which may be made from year to year, the work to stop when the appropriation stops and to commence again when another appropriation is made to construct it—under those circumstances it will cost from fifteen to twenty million dollars. It is a wasteful way in which to construct this work, if it be a worthy and necessary work which the Government ought to undertake. And I wish here and now to put on record my belief that if this work is adopted upon a river and harbor bill and continued under subsequent river and harbor bills it will not be completed in twenty years from this time, and not a boat will pass from the Mississippi River to Chicago in twenty years. If it is commenced under the river and harbor bill, it will be continued under the river and harbor bill. Having commenced it under the river and harbor bill, which commits the Government to the work, the friends of the measure, I think, will find it hard to take it out from the river and harbor bill and to vote a sum necessary for its completion in the two or three years' time in which it ought to be completed. That is the second reason which controls my vote.

My third reason is that I am far from being convinced that this enterprise, even with all that its friends claim for it, will answer the purpose for which we are asked to adopt it. I understand the proposition to be this, to cheapen transportation between the Mississippi River and the lakes at Chicago for the vast agricultural products which are raised and grown in the upper valley of the Mississippi and in the States which would find an outlet through this canal. In other words, the proposition is that the Government shall construct this canal for the purpose of putting it in competition with the railroads which now carry these products from that section of the country to Chicago; and that is the only ground upon which it can be justified as a national work. In that sense it is not local. In that sense it affects a vast portion of this country, affects the section of the country in which I reside perhaps as definitely and immediately as it does that section of the country where these products are grown. But I doubt very much whether this canal, if built, is going to have the effect that its projectors suppose it will. Certainly if built under the river and harbor bills it will have no such effect for ten or fifteen years, because it will not be constructed and completed in ten or fifteen years. Long before that time, in my judgment, the rate of transportation by railroads, by reason of the competition already existing among the railroads, will be so reduced that it will be exceedingly doubtful whether this canal will be able to reduce the rates any further.

I see from this report that the rate of transportation per ton per mile on the Erie Canal for the year 1880 was forty-nine hundredths of a cent per ton per mile; in other words, it was practically 5 mills per ton per mile on the Erie Canal. I maintain there is to be no cheaper transportation on this canal than on the Erie Canal, for I find that in 18 or 23 miles (I do not remember which) there is a lockage of 208 feet from Hennepin up to the summit going west, and from the summit down to the Mississippi River, as you take one or the other of the three routes, there is a lockage of from 70 to 100 feet, and there is a large lockage also as you go toward Chicago. I imagine there will be no cheaper transportation on this canal than on the Erie Canal.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator will permit me to state that the rate he is giving on the Erie Canal was undoubtedly the rate before the tolls were removed. Now it is free.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know, and I have no means of knowing what it is. I intended to look it up, but I have had no time. But however that may be——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. Excuse me; let me finish the sentence. However that may be, it is undeniably true that during the past year, 1885, railroads have been carrying grain from Chicago to New York at a less rate than that, at less than half a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to know whether I understood the position of the Senator with reference to the rate per ton per mile on the Erie Canal.

Mr. PLATT. It is given in 1880 at just a fraction less than half a cent a ton per mile, at $\frac{49}{100}$ of a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from New York contradict that?

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from New York suggests that that was before the tolls were removed. That is very possibly true. But I undertake to say, without having the figures by me and venturing solely upon my recollection, that there have been times when grain has been transported from Chicago to New York by rail for less than 4 mills per ton per mile, and I think less than 3 mills, but I do not want to overstate the matter.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. That was I think a year ago last fall when freight was carried from Chicago to New York at 10 cents a hundred. I think it only applied to grain, but it was not contended that the railroads did a living business. They did that in preference to going back East with empty cars. It was the water communication that forced them down to that, the competition of the lakes and canals. From what knowledge I have, I do not suppose that railroads independently of other business can carry freight for less than half a cent per ton per mile and pay expenses.

Mr. PLATT. That is, to-day?

M. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to state in this connection that the State board of New York, I understand, reported that the cost of transporting wheat on the New York Central Railroad was fifty-four one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know what the State board of New York has reported. I know what railroads have been doing in the past year. I know they have been carrying wheat from Chicago to New York for less than one-half of 1 cent per ton per mile. I know that in 1880 (it is so stated here in the report) the rate on the Erie Canal was practically one-half of a cent per ton per mile. But that is not important except in view of the suggestion which I am going to make.

The reduction of freight by railroads has been continuous and steady for a number of years. Five or six or eight years ago it would have been said that it was impossible for a railroad to carry at less than 1 cent per ton per mile; but we have seen in a short time a reduction to half a cent per ton per mile. The limit of that reduction is not yet reached. Nobody supposes that railroads will be deprived of all their carrying business when this canal is completed.

It is proposed to construct this canal so as to make the railroads reduce their charges from the Mississippi River to Chicago. Let us see if the railroad charges are not going to be reduced without this canal. The canal will not be built in five years; I do not believe it will be completed in ten years. During that five or ten years there will be, in my judgment, a continual reduction of the cost of transportation arising by railroad competition, so that when this canal is built I think it very doubtful whether there will be a state of things which will justify the object of building it. I think it is very doubtful whether by the time this canal can be completed the railroads themselves will not have been forced to cheapen the cost of transportation so that a canal will have little effect in the further cheapening of it.

This is going to be a more expensive canal to transport goods over than the Erie Canal by reason of its great lockage. But, Mr. President, I wish to make another suggestion. I said this is not a river or a harbor improvement. It is undertaking a Government work with the avowed purpose of coming in competition with the railroads and cheapening the rate of freights upon railroads, so as to lessen the cost of transportation from the West to the East. That is what this project is, and that being the project, I believe it can be reached much better in another way.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says that canals are antiquated. They are to some extent. I wish to suggest that if the Government really wants to cheapen transportation from the Upper Mississippi Valley to Chicago and the East, the way to do it is to build a railroad and not to build a canal. You can build a railroad for half the cost at which you propose to build this canal. You can build a railroad from Rock Island to Chicago, splendidly equipped with every facility for transporting freight and passengers even at the lowest possible rate, for less than half what this canal will cost, according to the estimate of its friends.

Mr. SPOONER. You could not get a railroad into the city of Chicago for that sum.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know anything about the city of Chicago and the expense of getting a railroad into the city of Chicago; but I undertake to say that a railroad of 175 miles (and it is less than that from Rock Island to Chicago), built as railroads ought to be, honestly and for cash, can be built running to a spot on the lakes where the grain can be transferred into ships, for less than one-half what it is proposed to expend on this canal.

Of course I speak somewhat without the figures and without knowledge on this subject, but I think a little investigation would justify what I say in this respect. But whether it costs one-half or whether it costs as much, if the Government wants to go into competition with the railroads for cheapening the transportation of freight the way to do it is by building railroads. If the Government can build a canal it can build a railroad; if it can operate a canal it can operate a railroad; and if it wants to cheapen transportation in this country because railroad charges are too high, the way is to build a railroad for cash, and operate it upon a basis on which it can be honestly operated.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator might say right there that very often after the expenditure of money for the improvement of a river the Government can not charge any toll whatever for the use of the work except what is necessary to pay expenses.

Mr. PLATT. I was about to make that remark. The proposition is to build this work for $10,000,000 in round numbers; I think it will cost $15,000,000; and then——

Mr. MCMILLAN. None of the estimates amount to either of the sums named.

Mr. PLATT. Everybody knows that these estimates are of no earthly consequence in settling the question of practical cost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will cost $25,000,000 if you build a canal good for anything.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I presume where three surveys of routes have been made by civil engineers and they have made estimates per mile, and have taken into consideration the size of the canal, the dimensions in every respect, it will be about as reliable as a statement made on the floor of the Senate by a Senator without consideration.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to know what the Senator refers to as a civil engineer. What does he call a civil engineer for the purpose of this work?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The civil engineers are officers of the Army.

Mr. PLUMB. That is just where the Senator is mistaken. The Government of the United States has no civil engineers in its employ except as they are employed as the underlings of the Army engineers, the military engineers, for that purpose. The others are military engineers, with no education necessary to the performance of a civil function.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the engineers of the Army are not familiar with the art of civil engineering, I should like to know who are.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to finish my speech, which will take but a moment longer. I take these estimates, I say honest estimates if you please, made in perfect honesty.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Seven millions of dollars is the estimate.

Mr. PLATT. It is $7,000,000 from Hennepin to the Mississippi River, and nearly $3,000,000 for improving the canal from the Illinois River at Hennepin to Chicago, which canal will not be good for anything until it is enlarged. It is between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000, according to their estimates.

But as I said before, take those estimates and say they are perfectly honest, everybody knows that this work is to be constructed under river and harbor bills, with a dribbling appropriation, or with no appropriation, or with the money expended as the appropriation may be available, it will cost 50 per cent. more than the estimates, even if built upon those estimates, from the time the work is commenced until it is completed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLATT. Wait a moment. I wish to make my speech, and then I will answer any question I can.

What is the proposition of the Government? It is to expend this money in a canal, and then not to charge any toll upon it, to make it free to everybody to use it, and so cheapen transportation from the upper valley of the Mississippi for its great agricultural products to Chicago and the East. Let the Government build a railroad upon those same conditions. Let it give its railroad free to everybody who wants to use it. It can run a railroad as well as it can run a canal. I undertake to say that, in my judgment, to-day transportation by rail with an honestly built and an honestly managed railroad can be done cheaper than by this canal even, and pay some returns to the Government; and when the Government would give the railroad to anybody, you could transport grain and the other agricultural products from this great grain-producing region to Chicago and the East over a free railroad a great deal cheaper than you could transport the products over a free canal.

Mr. President, we may as well look this question in the face. The railroad question in the United States has got to be settled some time or other, and it has got to be settled before a great while. This is a good time to make an experiment which would go a long way toward a settlement of the question. For myself, I want to see the day come when this Government will build and operate one line of railroad somewhere so that it may fairly determine what is a proper rate of charge for freights and passengers upon a railroad.

Do gentlemen say you could not operate such a road if it was free to everybody? There is not a railroad president in the United States who practically operates his railroad. My friend from California knows nothing about the practical operations, the dispatching of trains or the running of trains over his railroad; all that is committed to the train-dispatchers or the superintendent. Can not those superintendents and dispatchers be as well employed by the Government as by railroad corporations? Let the railroad be what it was intended it should be—a road free to everybody to put cars upon it and to run them.

I have said practically all I desire to say except this: It will be urged that to do that breaks bulk on the Mississippi River at Rock Island and breaks bulk at Chicago for products going east. The canal breaks bulk at Chicago. This canal is not to take boats which come down the Mississippi River and come into the canal and then transport them east of Chicago to the Eastern markets. Those boats are not adapted to that. The boats of which my friend from Illinois spoke are 300 tons, or probably five or six hundred ton boats; so that they will have to break bulk at Chicago, and a railroad in place of a canal would only have the additional breaking bulk at Rock Island or whatever the point on the river from which the railroad might start. So I think there would be no great additional expense to be incurred in that way.

These ideas may be crude, but I believe in addition to all the other reasons I have given why I can not vote for this amendment, if you are going in competition with railroads you have got to do it by a railroad. I believe, as I said, that if this Government does not settle pretty soon the question of railroad transportation, and settle it in the interest of the people, the people will settle it for themselves by the Government taking charge of all the railroads in this country. I do not want to see that done. I do not want to see the railroads of this country pass into the control of the Government; but I should like to see the Government make that experiment so as to show what can be done upon a railroad.

Pursuing the matter of which I was speaking a minute ago, if you do not want to break bulk at Rock Island with the boats that come down the Mississippi River laden with produce going over this route to Chicago, then build a railroad according to the Eads principle and transport the boats on that. It would be a good opportunity to settle that question as an experiment.

In view of the suggestions I have made, that this bill is already too large; that the Republican party is to stand charged before the country with its enlargement from fifteen million to the point at which it shall leave the Senate and pass, if it ever passes; and in view of the fact that this work will never be completed within the next ten years if carried on under river and harbor bills, and that if we are going into competition with railroads the best way to go into competition is to go in with a railroad, I think I am justified in voting against this amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the honorable Senator who last addressed the Senate has served so long upon the committee on transportation by railroads that he is of the opinion that there is no other system which will carry freight except railroads; and he indorses the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri a day or two since that canals and water ways are obsolete. If that is true, why bring in any river and harbor bill? Why not strike out the rivers and confine ourselves to the harbors alone? If railroads have superseded rivers and canals, then why should we, as is proposed, expend $3,000,000 on the Mississippi River? That amount would build a great deal of railroad. If I recollect aright, in the last ten years we have spent on the Mississippi River somewhere from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. I do not remember in how many years, but at least within a few years we have spent $6,000,000 or more on the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi.

Mr. ALLISON. More than $20,000,000 have been spent on the Mississippi River in that time.

Mr. TELLER. More than $20,000,000, the Senator from Iowa says, have been spent in ten years on the Mississippi River alone.

Mr. PLATT. And there is not much to show for it.

Mr. TELLER. Very good; there may not be much to show for it. I do not think we have as much to show for it as we ought to have. I am not defending it; but as long as we continue the system of putting money upon rivers, it does not lie in the mouth of the members of the committee or members of the Senate to come here and say that canals are obsolete, that the canal system is worn out, and that we must put our money in railroads.

Mr. President, I do not intend vote for this river and harbor bill myself. I do not think the bill is a proper bill. I find the objection to it which the Senator from Connecticut finds, that it is too big a bill, not that I am not willing to vote $20,000,000 to-day for deserving and proper objects. I will vote it for the harbors, and I will vote it for such rivers as need it and which will promote the commerce of the country when they are enlarged; but the great number of rivers provided for in the bill which have no national character whatever, and the great number of local interests which are put in the bill, swell it beyond the value that is to be derived from the expenditure, in my judgment.

For the pending amendment I intend to vote. I intend to vote for it because it is one of the few meritorious things, in my judgment, in the bill. I know that the Senator is correct when he says that it is a poor method to put a little money on it this year and a little next year. At least eight years ago in the Senate I expressed my views upon that subject, and said that the right and proper method was to appropriate sufficient to complete the enterprise, and do it at once. I should be glad myself to vote in this bill or some other for the necessary $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 that it is supposed this canal will cost, believing that there would be a corresponding advantage to the people of the United States, and one that would justify the expenditure of the money.

The Senator says that there will be resultant damages from the loss of the water-powers on the Rock River to their owners. If the Senator had examined the reports of the engineers, which have never been disputed, he would have seen that there is a report stating that nothing of that kind can occur. If he had been as familiar with the river as some people are in the Senate, he would have known that it is a thing not to be supposed.

There are only two water-powers between Dixon and the mouth of the river, one at Sterling and one at the town of Linden. This canal could be so constructed as to enter the dam, if necessary, at Sterling and make it a water way. As to Linden, it would not at all interfere with the operations at that point. Then there is another one near the mouth of the river, but when you get there the canal nowhere interferes with it at all, and it is not pretended by the owners of that water-power that there will be any interference. They are the parties who are anxious to have that line taken and to bring the canal as near to it as possible.

As the Senator says, the day is too warm and the time too late to go into an extensive discussion of this bill or of the various amendments in the bill. Here is a proposition to connect the great lakes with the Mississippi River. The proposition is twofold. It is to con nect the lakes with the upper river and with the lower river, the lower river by the way of the Illinois River, the upper river by the way of Green River, Rock River, the Winnebago Swamp, and the Marais d'Osier Swamp, and thus into the Mississippi River above the city of Rock Island. There will be two opportunities then for commerce, one for the lower river and one for the upper.

I can not conceive that the Government of the United States can in this direction anywhere spend its money with greater advantage than in providing a cheap market for the grain of the Northwest. The States which are furnishing to-day the great bulk of the grain that is being consumed by the people of the United States would be directly benefited by this amendment.

Mr. MILLER. And those who consume the grain.

Mr. TELLER. Then, on the other hand, as suggested by the Senator from New York, all the people who consume the grain would be benefited.

It is estimated by competent judges that it would cheapen the price of transportation from the grain fields to the city of Chicago 6 cents on every bushel of wheat, corn, and oats; a sum almost incalculable if gentlemen will stop to figure up the amount of freight of that character which comes into the city of Chicago, not for the benefit of the people of Chicago, but for the benefit of the consumers in New York city, in New England, and all the Eastern part of the country, as that section of the country draws its large supply of grain and meats from the Northwest.

There never seems to be very much opposition to the improvement of the Mississippi River and to various enterprises of this kind in the older and more settled portions of the country, but whenever there is a proposition to do something for the newer States I notice that a spirit of economy comes over the Senate, and everybody then is for saving whatever he can, and unless you can show that it will return a profit to the Government at once, it is said that the expense must not be incurred.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I believe in a river and harbor bill. I have always believed in it. I believe it is one of the most defensible bills that ever comes before Congress, and I am astonished that the friends of improvements in different parts of the country, when we have an overflowing Treasury, instead of apologizing for the amount they ask for, should not take the aggressive and put forth arguments, and I think I can, by way of illustration, give them an instance or two that will justify them before their own consciences and before the country.

I believe if it had not been for the river and harbor bills of the past corn to-day would be used for fuel in Kansas and Nebraska and cattle would be killed for their hides and horns, because the people could not afford to transport them to the seaboard.

By way of illustration, I have a table here which has been carefully prepared showing the decrease in freights from Chicago to Buffalo from 1857 to 1885. In 1857 the average rate of freight on wheat from Chicago to Buffalo was 13¼ cents per bushel. In 1885 it was 2 cents. I think that is a little low, that 2 cents was the minimum; but it was not 3 cents. However, we will call it 3 cents. In 1857 it was 13¼ cents per bushel, and in 1885 it was 3 cents. This table shows it to be 2 cents.

	Cents.
1857	13¼
1874	4
1881	3 7/10
1884	2 1/10

There passed through the Detroit River, over the Lime Kiln Crossings, nineteen millions six hundred and forty-five thousand and some hundred tons in 1885. This, resolved into bushels of wheat, would be equivalent to 644,500,000 bushels. The great bulk of that was through freight. It was freight from Chicago to Buffalo, wheat and corn, but we will say that only three-quarters of it was through freight. That would make an equivalent to 495,000,000 bushels that passed over the Lime Kiln Crossings. The saving on that was 10 cents a bushel, or $49,500,000.

But we must remember that at the same time there were probably carried over the Michigan Central, the Michigan Lake Shore, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Pennsylvania Central, and Grand Trunk Railroads an amount of freight from Chicago equal to the amount carried by lake, for competition with the railroads is what has reduced the price of freight from 13¼ cents down to 2 cents, aided by the improvements made by the river and harbor acts.

It is fair to infer that $49,500,000 was saved on the freight carried over the different roads. There is $100,000,000 saved in one year by virtue of the improvements on the lakes, and I think never over a million dollars in any one year has been appropriated for the lakes, unless it was some year when a lock was to be built at Sault de St. Marie.

Men do not comprehend the immense saving that has been brought about by the river and harbor acts of the past, but $100,000,000 a year can be mathematically figured out as made or saved by virtue of improvements on the lakes. I do not think that any one who looks over the figures will feel at all inclined to gainsay it.

In regard to the comparative merits of railroad and water transportation, I have here a table showing the way the freights were brought down on lake transportation by the railroad competition and improvements of channels on the lakes. In 1868 by lake and canal it cost 24.54 cents to carry a bushel of grain from Chicago to New York. It cost by lake and rail 29 cents. It cost all rail 42½ cents, or nearly double the price by water.

The same proportion prevails down the table until we come to 1884, when the cost by lake and canal was 6.60 cents, by lake and rail 9.07 cents, and all rail 13 cents. I here submit a table.

Average freight charges per bushel for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to New York during the years 1868 to 1884, inclusive:

Calendar years.	By lake and canal.*	By lake and rail.	By all rail.
1868	$0 24.54	$0 29.00	$0 42.60
1869	23.12	25.00	35.10
1870	17.10	22.00	33.30
1871	20.24	25.00	31.00
1872	24.50	28.00	33.50
1873	19.19	26.90	33.20
1874	14.10	16.90	28.70
1875	11.43	14.60	24.10
1876	9.58	11.80	16.50
1877	11.24	15.80	20.30
1878	9.15	11.40	17.70
1879	11.60	13.30	17.30
1880	12.27	15.70	19.70
1881	8.19	13.40	14.40
1882	7.89	10.90	14.60
1883	8.40	11.50	16.50
1884	6.60	9.70	13.00

*Including Buffalo transfer charges and tolls.

During all these years from 1868 to 1884 it has cost about double to transport by rail that it has cost by lake and by canal. I do not think that you can have a better illustration of the comparative merits of railroad transportation and water transportation than in this table.

In regard to the improvement upon Lake Superior, gentlemen see large amounts, $350,000, voted for the purchase of the Portage Lake Ship Canal and for the Sault de St. Marie locks and Hay Lake channel, but just observe how the commerce of Lake Superior has increased. In 1877 there were 503,899 bushels of wheat shipped by lake from Duluth. In 1885 there were 13,458,000 bushels, showing an increase in eight years of nearly 3,000 per cent., and the increase in the future will probably be as rapid as it has been in the past.

I do not agree with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that railroads are ever going to take the place of water transportation where it is possible to get a canal in a natural bed. Possibly going across some horseback where it requires a tunnel, as on the Isthmus of Panama, railroads may be preferable, but this thing stands out in the past, and I think it will stand out in the future, that the solving of the transportation of grain to the seaboard and of coal and other freight back is going to be brought about by the rivalry between railroads and water communication, and it is absolutely essential that the Government should take hold of these water routes and improve them so as to give the mass of the people a chance for fair competition.

In regard to the Mississippi River, I have been very glad to see appropriations voted annually for that stream. I think very likely we may throw away $50,000,000 before we accomplish any good, but we shall by that time have learned a way by which we can curb or regulate the Father of Waters. We have got to pay for our information, for our tuition, for our education, and if every gentleman would stand up and avow his belief, if he has it, and not seek to apologize for these appropriations, I believe we can go before the people, either Democrats or Republicans, and always be sustained.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. President, I could wish that some other representative from New England had felt called upon to speak in favor of this great national system of internal improvements. I had not expected to address the Senate in regard to this bill or any of the items in it; but after the remarks made by my distinguished friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], whom I honor highly and in whose judgment I have great confidence, I feel that I can not let this discussion pass upon this item in the bill without saying that for one, representing a New England constituency, I am heartily in favor of the appropriation for the Hennepin Canal.

The matter of aid to internal improvements has steadily grown in the public sentiment of this country. For more than fifty years the public press have been attacking this principle. It has been attacked with most wonderful unanimity by the press, representing all parties and all shades of political opinion. Yet in the face of these persistent, unremitting, and unfair attacks the people of the country and of all sections of the country have grown more and more to appreciate the value and the importance to their material interests of the improvements of the rivers and harbors and the internal means of transportation in the country.

When the famine occurred in Ireland thousands of people starved to death within a very short distance of stores of food, simply because there were not the means of transporting it from the store-houses to the people who needed it. This is a matter of fact. The millions of India have been sunk in poverty largely for the want of means of transportation, and the recent wonderful growth of that country is owing to the fact that the English government in the last twenty years has spent nearly one thousand millions of dollars in improving the means of transportation in that country.

We have presented before us to-day a problem new to the history of this people. We have looked upon our means of producing the ordinary subsistence for the people as beyond approach by any other nation; but to-day we are threatened by the competition of India. In fact, were it not for the small 20 per cent. duty laid upon cereals there have been times during the past year when wheat might have been laid down in the port of New York in competition with our Western wheat. We of the East do not ask for a remission of these duties. We believe and hold to the principle that that which builds up and is good for one locality, for one section, is good for the whole. We believe that if the building of the Hennepin Canal enables the producer of Western produce to land it at the shore cheaper it is a benefit to us.

But it approaches us more nearly. We want this food, and we want our goods transported back by the same means, and for that reason, in my judgment, the people of the East are in favor of this improvement.

The Senator from Connecticut went into some very learned and abstruse calculations in regard to the cost of transportation per mile over railroads and by water. That is not in my opinion an argument which reaches this question. It seems to me that it must be apparent that the great cause which has brought about the reduction of rates of freight between the East and the West has been the improved means of transportation by water; and a very slight examination will prove it. If any person will examine the transportation rates by railroad between the East and the West he will find that they are the lowest where a railroad comes in competition with a water route.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me to call his attention to one fact which I think illustrates his position?

Mr. CHACE. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLAN. During the season of navigation on the lakes the railroads regularly reduce their freights, and at the close of navigation they invariably raise them.

Mr. CHACE. Yes, that is very true; and I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion. That simple suggestion is a practical illustration of the effect of this competition.

The people of this country are not afraid of the expenditure of a few millions of dollars for these purposes. They are able to spend the money if they are to be benefited by it, and they are willing to spend it. I know not, nor do I care, what influence operates upon the public press of this country to lead them to make such persistent attacks upon this policy, but I do know, and I know from practical experience in my own personal business, that when we have been able to avail ourselves of water competition we have uniformly obtained cheaper rates from the railroads than we could get under any other circumstances; and in that simple fact, which I wish to reiterate, lies the merit of this appropriation.

To talk about building a railroad to be equipped by the public and owned by the Government it seems to me is chimerical in the extreme. Furthermore, the honorable Senator from Connecticut did not enlighten us upon what it would cost to build such a railroad. If I am not mistaken, and I speak from memory, all the railroads in this country, single and double track, have cost on an average a little over $50,000 per mile, including equipment, and every single mile of railroad between tide water and the Mississippi River, with its equipment and the necessary means of operation, has cost over $100,000 per mile. Senators can multiply $100,000 per mile by 100 miles, and they will find that a railroad will cost very nearly as much as the estimate for the canal.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Rhode Island will permit me to suggest that he is confounding the cost with the bonds and stock issued upon the road. Probably the two sums are entirely different. The cost of the railroads of the United States has not been equal to $100,000 per mile or anything like it.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will excuse me, I said the cost of railroads in this country, single and double track, had been over $50,000 per mile.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator said that with the equipment the roads cost $100,000 per mile.

Mr. CHACE. I said that in my judgment (and I will reiterate it, and I will challenge the Senator to go into the figures upon the cost, having had some little experience in it myself) that you can not build and equip these great railroad lines as they are built between the Mississippi and tide water to-day for less than $100,000 per mile.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator must then arrange his figures in a little different proportion, for he says that it costs $50,000 a mile to build a railroad. He certainly does not claim that it costs $50,000 a mile to equip a railroad.

Mr. CHACE. But the Senator does not understand me. In speaking of $50,000 a mile I was alluding to all the railroads in the country, a very large proportion of them being single-track roads, built where they can be cheaply constructed, where the land lies like a large portion of the roads on the plains of the West, and taking all together the roads have cost $50,000 a mile.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that is by far an overstatement of the cost; but one thing the Senator should also state, and that is that railroads could never be built so cheaply as they can be now with the single exception of right of way. The material which enters into the cost of railroads never has been so cheap as at the present moment.

Mr. CHACE. That is true.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt that a hundred miles of railroad could be built and equipped for all business purposes for less than $50,000 a mile, certainly for not more than $50,000.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator forgets, however, that probably all the early railroads that were built in New England were built when labor was about five-eighths of a dollar per day, or from 60 to 65 cents, and you could not get that labor to-day at less than $1.75.

Mr. PLUMB. Does that include the labor it took to pour water into the stock?

Mr. CHACE. I beg to assure the Senator that watered stocks in New England are scarce.

Mr. PLUMB. Then the New England people with whom we have had experience out West must have acquired the taste for watered stock at a very late period. My impression was that they had it by experience at home, and merely transferred their experience.

Mr. CHACE. That shows the evil effects of Western association. That is what I say to that. It does not touch this case.

Mr. PLUMB. That is not the entire statement; it was the effect of evil association on the other end of the line.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator from Kansas may hew these facts as he pleases, but he will find that if he had to build a railroad he could not make it at much over the cost of the canal; but whether he could or not, that is not the point. Everybody knows that the United States Government is not going to build a railroad, and the Senator from Kansas, with his keen business instinct, knows perfectly well that after it was built it would be perfectly chimerical to talk about opening the railroad to public management. Furthermore, he knows that the experience of every State which has ever attempted the construction and operation of a railroad has been a failure and a flat failure, and it has been so all over the country. It is not an argument that is to touch this question, in my judgment.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHACE. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. What would hinder the building of a railroad if Congress should vote the necessary money? The Senator says the Government will not build it. That is simply because Congress will not vote the money, I take it. If all the evidence could be produced in favor of a railroad that we have in favor of a canal, Congress could vote the money and put it through speedily.

Mr. CHACE. And if Congress would approach the subject, the Senator with all his care would be the first one to vote "no."

Mr. PLUMB. No, I would vote "ay."

Mr. CHACE. The Senator will not have an opportunity.

I was saying that I believe the vast majority of the people of this country are in favor of these appropriations and in favor of liberal appropriations for these purposes. They know and appreciate fully that they must improve the means of transportation if they are to retain their business position in competition with the nations of the world. The only thing that has enabled us to compete as producers of cereals with the world has been the fact that we could lay those cereals down at tide water cheaply. The only thing that has enabled us to progress in our manufacturing arts is because we have been able to transport our stuff cheaply over these vast reaches in the country.

I say that the people of New England want the food from the West and they want it brought cheaply. The people of the West want goods from the East, and they want them brought cheaply. For that reason, I know from practical experience, having felt the pulse of the people whom I represent, that they are ready for these improvements and they are ready for this improvement.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the solicitude of those who represent the Atlantic seaboard and the manufacturing portions of this country for the interests and the welfare of the grain-growers of the West and the farmers of the Mississippi Valley touches my tenderest sensibility. I hope before we get through with this debate that some political philosopher who is urging these appropriations from the national Treasury for the construction of East and West water lines of transportation will tell us who pays the cost of transportation on the grain and the cattle of the West. I have always understood that it was the consumer who paid the transportation rates. It has never occurred to me that when there was a diminution in the rates of transportation the producer got the benefit of it.

When I first went West some quarter of a century ago our supplies of building lumber came from the forests of Wisconsin by way of the lakes and the rivers around by Saint Louis and then up by steamer to the ports of the Territory of Kansas; and it used to cost us $100 a thousand to buy material for building our shanties on the prairies and constructing our fences, in addition to the rates that were charged for hauling from the lumber yards to the place where the lumber was used. In the course of time railroads were constructed, and lumber was brought directly across the country instead of being brought around by steamer to our ports, and the price went down to $15 or $20 a thousand. Will anybody tell me that because of the fact that the rate of transportation went down so that we got our lumber at $20 a thousand there was any increase in the price in the pineries of Wisconsin? Mr. President, it is laughable. We got our lumber in Kansas cheaper. In just as much as the rates of transportation went down the price receded in the market where it was delivered for consumption, and we got the benefit of it. The price did not go up in the pineries of Wisconsin.

It is an absurd inversion of the facts of political philosophy and political economy to say that decreasing the rate of transportation is an enormous benefit to the producer of the grain and the agricultural products in the interior region of this country.

I do not wonder that the Senators from New England favor these appropriations. I should suppose they would do it, because, as the Senator from Rhode Island states, they need our grain. They do not raise wheat and corn enough in New England to give them a breakfast one month in the year, year in and out, and they would starve to death if they were left for subsistence to the products of their own fields.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not speak of that in discredit or disparagement of New England.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. CHACE. Is the Senator aware that within the last five months wheat has been sold in London for a less price than it was sold for in the Chicago market on the same day?

Mr. INGALLS. What has that got to do with this question?

Mr. CHACE. It has this to do with it: The Senator will see very plainly that unless you can transport your wheat to tide water cheaply your farmers will suffer in the operation.

Mr. INGALLS. The man in New York who buys for the purpose of transportation, the stock-broker and the gambler in grain, the man who buys it for the purpose of daily consumption, the man in Liverpool, these persons get the advantage of cheap transportation. Does the Senator from Rhode Island pretend to tell me that when the rate of transportation goes down a cent a bushel to New York the farmer of Kansas gets advantage of 1 cent a bushel in the price he receives?

Mr. CHACE. Certainly I do.

Mr. INGALLS. It is preposterous.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will allow me, I will say further, that before the lines of transportation were improved as they have been corn was burned on the prairies of Illinois, because it could not be transported cheaply enough to the East. Does the Senator affirm that that is not a fact?

Mr. INGALLS. That is going into another branch of this question altogether. I am not talking about surplus; I am not talking about the exchange of products. I am not talking about the advantage of markets that would enable us to get our freights back again as cheaply from New England to the Missouri River as you get them from the Missouri River to the seaboard; but to tell me that the decrease of a cent a bushel in the rate from Atchison to New York raises the price of wheat or corn 1 cent in the elevators of my city is an absurd piece of nonsense, and everybody knows it.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. CHACE. Does the Senator deny that if the 10 per cent. that is exported declines in price the other 90 per cent. will not be affected?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator evades the issue.

Mr. CHACE. That is the very issue; that is the whole thing.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not the issue.

Mr. CHACE. If you can not export your surplus you can not maintain your price.

Mr. INGALLS. If we can not export our surplus we shall raise something else. We are not limited to wheat or to corn.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. What would we raise if we did not raise wheat and corn, and what would we do with it after we raised it?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Michigan intends to have me solve every question of political economy in this debate, of course it will take a longer time than we can afford to spend on the river and harbor bill. I do not propose to indulge in a disquisition upon any other features than the one before us.

When the Senator from Rhode Island poses here as the friend of the grain-growers of the West because he is in favor of an appropriation of ten millions to build the Hennepin Canal, I tell him that the people of the West are not deluded by that kind of argument. I tell him that no matter how much the price of the transportation of grain to New York may be reduced, the advantage of the reduction goes to the consumer who buys the grain or the gambler and broker who speculates in it, and not to the man who raises it on the prairie, of Illinois or the uplands of Kansas.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. Then I suppose the rule would work the other way. How about the merchandise which is transported from the seaboard to the West?

Mr. INGALLS. That is where the advantage comes in.

Mr. CHACE. Does not the West get the advantage of that?

Mr. INGALLS. That is where the advantage comes in, and it is a legitimate argument. It is undoubtedly true that we have the benefit of transportation from the East to the West on that which we buy or exchange. The fact that there is cheap transportation enables you to put down your cutlery, your cotton manufactures, your hardware, your woolen goods, and everything that we want and do not manufacture a great deal cheaper than you could without such cheap transportation. That is where we get the benefit of it. The price of those commodities does not go up in the markets of Rhode Island because they are cheaper to us in Kansas.

Mr. CHACE. Then you ought to be in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. INGALLS. I am in favor of such appropriations as I believe to be national in their importance, but I do not propose to have the Senator from Rhode Island suppose that the people of the West are in any way deluded by the theory he advances—that he is in a very self-sacrificing way favoring this appropriation because he wants the price of grain to go up in the West.

Mr. CHACE. The Senator does not wish to do me an injustice.

Mr. INGALLS. No; certainly not.

Mr. CHACE. I must protest that I did not put it upon any ground but the broadest and the soundest business principles. I stated in epitomizing that we wanted the freight brought from the West cheaply for our use, and that the West wanted the merchandise carried from the East cheaply for their use; that it was a fair give-and-take, a benefit for both parties.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

Mr. CHACE. I did not put it upon any philanthropic ground whatever, but upon a sound business basis.

Mr. INGALLS. Not only the Senator from Rhode Island, but the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] in his advocacy has announced that he was moved by profound philanthropy for these men of the frontier, that he wanted transportation cheapened in order that the men who are toiling beneath the sun on the prairies of the West should have a better price for their grain.

Mr. MILLER. I know I shall not interrupt the Senator, because he is always at his best when he is interrupted. His memory is not long enough, perhaps, to remember what I said.

Mr. INGALLS. You will find that I recollect something before I get through with this debate that I have not forgotten.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will wait until my remarks are written out, or if he will get them now, he will find that in pretending to quote from me he has not quoted a single word or sentence or the expression of a single idea which I used in my speech.

Mr. INGALLS. I had not supposed the Senator had any ideas and I was not pretending to quote his ideas. Of course that would be a superfluity and a work of supererogation.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator is always witty. The other day he quoted an old saw by telling me if I knew more I would be wiser. He is now repeating an old saw by stating that the Senator from New York has no ideas. That is a witticism which I am very glad to have go on the record and let it go for what it is worth. It is as old as the Senator and all of us put together.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not invite this interruption.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator submitted to the interruption.

Mr. INGALLS. I did indeed, and I submit to the results of it. I did not pretend, no person could, to quote the language of the Senator from New York. So far as his ideas are concerned I have already dwelt upon that, and so far as his language is concerned I did not pretend to quote it, but I said that he, in his speech, dwelt upon the idea that the votes of the seaboard were being given to these appropriations as a philanthropic act toward the grain-growers of the West.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. I repudiate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. The Senator states that I am in favor of this appropriation and this amendment upon the idea that the East was willing to vote this and other appropriations for philanthropic reasons. I state again that I did not argue it upon any such proposition whatever.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, now I suppose that matter may be considered as settled.

Mr. MILLER. Unless you repeat the statement which I did not make and state that I said it.

Mr. INGALLS. It is hardly worth while to repeat it because it is the stock argument, and I rose at this particular juncture of time for the purpose of stating, as one of the representatives of that region, that we do not accept any gratuities; we are not asking for any appropriations in this bill or any other as a charity; and I state further that every dollar that is appropriated out of the Treasury for an east and west water way is a dollar that is to be expended in violation of the laws of nature and against the best interests of that portion of the country, for so far as the Mississippi Valley is concerned, that great basin extending from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, they have their own water ways and they have their own system of interior communication, and they do not ask any money for the purpose of creating new water ways that shall run east and west upon this continent. They can take care of themselves.

Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island spoke about the great popular desire for river and harbor bills, and said that for fifty years last past they had been a portion of the settled policy of this country. The merest tyro in these matters knows that from the time when Pierce vetoed a river and harbor bill, in 1854 or 1856, there never was another such bill presented till 1870.

Mr. CHACE. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. There was a hiatus of sixteen years.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes.

Mr. CHACE. I wish the Senator, if he is going to state my remarks, would quote them correctly. I said no such thing as the Senator attributes to me.

Mr. INGALLS. He said they had met with favor for fifty years past. He used the term "fifty years" and designated fifty years as a period within which the policy of this country had been directed to the annual expenditure of money for rivers and harbors; and yet I say that from the time when Franklin Pierce vetoed a river and harbor bill in 1854 or 1856—I forget which it was—there was not another river and harbor bill passed until 1870, a period of sixteen years. So then this whole scheme, as we now have it, is an outgrowth of recent ideas, a modern policy.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas will allow me to call his attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota will wait until the Chair can ascertain whether the Senator from Kansas will yield.

Mr. INGALLS. The Chair need never be at the trouble of stopping proceedings for the purpose of asking if I yield. If any Senator rises to address me, he has the opportunity without any interposition on the part of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules make it necessary for the Chair to interpose.

Mr. INGALLS. I waive the rules.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to comply with the rules, of course. If convenient to the Senator from Kansas, and merely for the purpose of his own information, I desire to call his attention to the dates of the bills passed at the period he refers to. An act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers was approved on the 30th of August, 1852; an act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under authority of law, and for other purposes, containing a number of appropriations, was approved June 23, 1866. In the intervening space there had been temporary provisions made by law for public improvements.

Mr. INGALLS. Not as river and harbor bills; never by that name or under that title, or in any such manner as these bills are now promoted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will read one. Here is "an act making appropriations for the construction, preservations, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes."

Mr. INGALLS. "Fortifications and other works of defense."

Mr. MCMILLAN. It embraces the Delaware Breakwater Harbor and appropriates $100,000 for it. There are some others of this kind between 1852 and 1866.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator supposes that that interferes with or militates in any way against my statement he is welcome to interrupt me.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I did not desire to cite them as interfering with the Senator's argument, but merely to give the facts.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Rhode Island further stated that for some reason or other these bills had been made the shining objects of attack on the part of the newspaper press of this country, and he expressed his wonder and surprise that when these bills were so deeply grounded in popular affection the newspaper press could have been so misguided as to express their disapprobation of the means and methods by which river and harbor bills were created and by which they were passed through both Houses of Congress. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that there is in this country a deep-seated conviction in favor of proper and just appropriations for the preservation of rivers and harbors and the improvement of navigation.

The Senator from New York spoke about the Erie Canal. I would vote cheerfully to-day to have the United States Government take the Erie Canal and undertake to maintain it and operate it free of toll to all the commerce of the earth that might desire to pass through it, and why? Because that is a great national work connecting the waters of the lakes and the waters of the ocean, and it has been so long in operation that it can justly be considered almost as one of the natural links in the great system of water ways that in my judgment ought to be under national control.

But the reason why there is a deep-seated suspicion in the public mind about these bills, and why the newspaper press, as the Senator from Rhode Island says, has assailed them, is not because appropriations should not be made for proper national objects, but because these bills have come to be regarded as illustrations of the most rapacious venality that has ever appeared in any legislative body beneath the sun.

Take this bill before us now, Mr. President, and there are five millions in it that can be characterized with no other phrase except that of "boodle." There are $5,000,000 in this bill that are filched from the Treasury if this bill passes, for the purpose of making men strong in their districts at home, for the purpose of enabling men to show their constituents that they can help them in Washington, for the purpose of bringing money into their States to be employed in the construction of water ways and channels of navigation that have no existence upon the map.

I should like, if time permitted, to call attention item by item to some amendments that have been put in this bill by the Committee on Commerce of this body—thousands upon thousands appropriated for the improvement of water ways over marshes with soft, muddy bottoms, without a current or channel, where there is not to exceed 12 to 18 inches of water, and where the adjoining communities have nothing to export except barrel-staves and peanuts.

Sir, the people that I represent would spurn me, I should be an exile from their affections if I were to say that money should not be appropriated for great national objects, for the harbor of New York—and I am glad that the Senator from that State secured an amendment of a million for that purpose—for the great harbors along the Atlantic and Pacific, for the Ohio and Mississippi, and for the other natural water ways which are included in this bill. But, sir, it is not that of which this country complains; it is not that which the press assails. It is the money that is unjustifiably put in here, not for the purpose of improving water ways, but for the purpose of advancing political fortunes, for the purpose of making the bill strong enough so that by combinations that are made it can overcome any possible obstacles which may be presented in this body or the other.

I have prepared a small analysis, incomplete and unsatisfactory it is true, but that I think will serve to illustrate what I have said on this subject. The Committee on Commerce in this body is represented by the States of Maine, Minnesota, Michigan, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Texas, Missouri, Maryland, Florida, West Virginia, and Louisiana. I believe it is the largest committee in this body; but it never will be satisfied until it includes one member from every State in the American Union. The State of Michigan is represented by two members—one in the other House; the State of New York by two members; the State of Pennsylvania by two members; the State of Texas by two members; the State of Missouri by two members; the State of West Virginia by two members, and the State of Louisiana by two members. As this bill came from the House of Representatives, and as it has been amended by the Committee on Commerce, it happens that out of the total sum appropriated, with the amendments, those States that have been favored by membership of the committee obtain a grand total of $7,790,775, or about one-half. The State of Maine has $191,000; the State of Minnesota $120,000——

Mr. MCMILLAN. That embraces ports on Lake Superior.

Mr. INGALLS. The State of Michigan has $1,268,500; the State of New York, $1,904,500; the State of Oregon, $685,000; the State of Pennsylvania, $581,000; North Carolina, $410,000; Texas, $950,000; Missouri, $547,500, including the Missouri River; Maryland, $257,775; Florida, $397,000; West Virginia, $315,000; Louisiana, $163,000.

Now let us look at the increases as reported from the committee of the Senate. Maine has an increase of $40,000; Minnesota, $25,000; Michigan, $350,000; New York, $932,000; Oregon, $185,000; Pennsylvania, $40,000; North Carolina, $173,000; Texas and Missouri, having sufficient I suppose, were not increased; Maryland, $125,275; and Florida, her member of the committee being absent, was decreased $13,000; West Virginia was increased $100,000, and Louisiana $5,000, making a total increase by amendments in the Senate in those States represented by members of the committee of $1,975,275 out of $2,895,275, being nearly two-thirds of the entire increase by amendments in this body.

Mr. President, that can not be a coincidence. Everybody understands that that is not possibly a coincidence. Is there any Senator who believes that if North Carolina had not been represented on that committee she would have had $173,000 increase of appropriation in this bill? Does any one believe that if the Senator from Florida had not been unfortunately absent the appropriation for that State would have been decreased $13,000 in this bill? Does any one believe that had it not been for the importunate energy of the Senator from Michigan his State would have received an increase of $350,000, swelling the aggregate to the enormous total of $1,268,500? No, Mr. President, it is inconceivable; it is incredible. This was not an accident. By fine and subtle processes this bill was builded up to its present proportions. It could not otherwise have happened than by design that out of this total of $2,895,275 increase on this bill nearly two millions should occur in the States that are so fortunate as to have members upon the Committee on Commerce.

And, Mr. President, this is not the history of a solitary year. Year by year ever since 1870 the enormities of these bills have been increasing; they have become more and more apparent, until at last they have shocked the moral sense of the people. And it is in vain to tell me that there is some insensate, unnatural opposition on the part of the newspapers which has resulted in a corresponding feeling of discontent in the popular mind. That is not the way history is made; that is not the way public opinion is formed. Newspapers do not make public opinion; they reflect it. The keenest and shrewdest leaders in the newspaper world are the men who find out what is in the minds of the people and say it, who discover what the people want said and then utter it; and the Senator from Rhode Island inverts the process when he says that river and harbor bills have become disfavored in the public mind because there has been some inexplicable opposition to them on the part of the newspaper press.

Now, Mr. President, about this scheme to which our attention is called to-day for the purpose of constructing what is known as the Hennepin Canal. I have sent to the Library for the purpose of ascertaining the terms and conditions of the law of Illinois to which reference is made in the first clause of this paragraph, but I have been unable to find it. The committee did not see fit to quote it in their report, and I have sent to the Library and obtained a synopsis——

Mr. LOGAN. I will give you the law.

Mr. INGALLS. This synopsis is contained in the revised statutes of Illinois for the year 1883, edited by Mr. Hurst.

Mr. LOGAN. Here is the act [handing a book to Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the Government of the United States has donated to the State of Illinois about 300,000 acres of land for the construction of this work. How much has been expended and what part remains this report does not show.

Mr. VEST. There is a report which shows it. I read it the other day.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not seen that.

Mr. VEST. President Arthur's message contains the whole of it.

Mr. INGALLS. The first clause of this amendment declares that—

> The grant of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its rights of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State of Illinois may have in any real estate heretofore ceded to the State of Illinois by the United States for canal purposes, made to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approved April 28, 1882, be, and is hereby, accepted on the terms and conditions specified in the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois.

I can not understand what right the State of Illinois has to impose any "terms and conditions" on the Government of the United States. We gave them 300,000 acres of land to build this canal; and such of it as they have now constructed, running I believe from Chicago to some point below La Salle, perhaps Hennepin, has been completed and is operated by the State; and the language of the act of the Illinois Legislature is that this canal—

> Its right of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State may now have in any real estate ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes, be, and are hereby, ceded to the United States, for the purpose of making and maintaining an enlarged canal and water way from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers; and this cession is made upon the condition that the United States shall, within five years from the time this act takes effect, accept this grant, and thereafter maintain the said canal and water way for the purpose aforesaid.

This act further provides that—

> SEC. 2. The General Assembly shall have power to withdraw and revoke this proposed grant at any time previous to its acceptance by Congress; but when the United States, by act of Congress, shall accept the grant and conditions provided for by section 1 of this act, the governor shall immediately thereafter execute and deliver, in the name of the State of Illinois, to the United States, a deed of cession, in accordance with the provisions of this act, and shall then and there, or as soon as practicable, surrender all property mentioned in this act to be granted to the proper authorities of the United States.

That is to say, the Legislature of the State of Illinois makes a proposition to the Government of the United States offering to us a canal that has been very largely constructed out of funds that we gave that State, and says very kindly and very thoughtfully that we may have this work now constructed to the Illinois River upon the condition that we will take it up and continue the work to the Mississippi River and thereafter maintain and operate it for the purposes aforesaid, indefinitely, I suppose. If the State of Illinois has any proposition to make to the United States Government to relinquish any portion of its public works or to cede any part of its territory, it appears to me that it puts us in a very singular position to state that we will accept that only upon conditions tendered to us by the State that we shall take up this work where the State left it off and continue it at an indefinite expense to the Mississippi River from Hennepin, and thereafter maintain it free for the use of the commerce of the Northwest that may desire to pass through it. I believe this was submitted to the people of Illinois and agreed to by them.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. There are a number of documents accompanying a communication from the President of the United States made to the Forty-eighth Congress, first session, and printed as Executive Document No. 38, in which, under the signature of Governor Hamilton, dated November 12, 1883, appears a statement of what has been done with the fund that was donated by the Government of the United States and the present condition of the canal. He states that the original grant was made in the years 1822 and 1827, and that—

The gift and acceptance created a legal obligation on the part of the State to forever keep the canal in repair and open as a public water way for the purposes indicated in the acts of Congress, and this obligation can not be avoided at the will or convenience of the State. That the canal must be kept in operation forever is imperative, unless the State be released from this obligation.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. INGALLS. From the governor of the State of Illinois, Springfield, November, 1883, a communication signed by John M. Hamilton, governor of Illinois, and addressed to his excellency C. A. Arthur, President of the United States, Washington, D. C. This which I have read is contained in the letter of the governor with what purports to be an extract from a report of a committee of the Legislature submitted to the lower house on the 14th of April, 1882. He goes on to state:

Nor does the obligation work a hardship to the State. It has not proven "a bad bargain," but a profitable one. The entire cost of the canal in its construction is, principal and interest, $6,557,681.50. The amount of moneys received by the State from the sale of canal lands given by the United States is $5,886,039.68. This, added to the net earnings of the canal, namely, $2,933,691.74, makes an aggregate of lands and lots sold, with the net earnings of the canal, the sum of $8,819,731.42 realized by the State, which shows a balance of $2,262,049.92 clear profits which were paid into the State treasury, which is more than one-third of its entire cost.

But no portion of which do they propose to surrender, as I understand. The State of Illinois having constructed this canal out of funds given to it by the United States Government and operated——

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator pretend to say that the canal cost no more than the land sold for?

Mr. INGALLS. No; I gave the figures.

Mr. CULLOM. It cost much more than the proceeds of the land.

Mr. INGALLS. I read:

The entire cost of the canal in its construction is, principal and interest, $6,557,681.50. The amount of moneys received by the State from the sale of canal lands given by the United States is $5,886,039.68. This added to the net earnings of the canal, namely, $2,933,691.74, makes an aggregate of lands and lots sold with the net earnings of the canal the sum of $8,819,731.42 realized by the State, which shows a balance of $2,262,049.92 clear profits which were paid into the State treasury, which is more than one-third of its entire cost.

And yet with this amount, two millions and a quarter of clear profit on the construction of this canal out of the funds given by the United States Government and the tolls that have been received from it, the State of Illinois coolly proposes to give us the canal and keep the profits, upon the condition that we shall construct the remainder of it from Hennepin to the Mississippi River at an expense variously estimated at from seven million to twenty-five million dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is part of the statement the Senator ought to read, the next sentence.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not read that. I am glad the Senator calls my attention to that:

Besides this sum of money, the canal itself—

Besides this sum of money that is in the treasury of the State—

the canal itself and many millions' worth of real estate, part of said canal lands, yet belong to the State.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is to be ceded back. The reason I called the Senator's attention to that sentence was because I suppose the act of Illinois provides for receding these lands to the Federal Government.

Mr. INGALLS. The real estate has been ceded to the State of Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I think there ought to be fair dealing in all things. I think I represent about as honorable a constituency perhaps as the Senator from Kansas does; no more so, I will say; but the attempt that is being made to show that there was unfairness on the part of the State of Illinois by stating that the proceeds of the lands they had received left a profit of $2,000,000, when that amount was received from tolls, &c., is very unjust. To put it in that way and say the State proposes to keep that is, I think, a character of argument which ought not to be used by a gentleman who is a statesman, which I will admit. Now, the fact is that was done to show the Government that the acceptance of the canal was no hardship, that it was and is profitable to the State; but they cede back all the lands that they have received, which amounts to much more than this, and the Government receives the canal, which is a profitable highway in the way of tolls.

The Senator certainly does not suppose that any State that received tolls on a canal which it offered to the Government, so that a great ship-canal might be made out of it for the benefit of the Government and the people at large, should be criticised because of the fact that it says it has made $2,000,000 over and above the cost of the work by the tolls on the canal. I suppose his own State has received a few acres of land, and will cede them back to the Government in a few years, according to his argument.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be a statesman, The Senator from Illinois has a monopoly of statesmanship, and therefore I feel no humiliation at his criticism that the observations I have made are such as ought not to emanate from a statesman. Pretending to be nothing but a common, ordinary, cheap kind of a legislator, looking out for the interests of the country as well as I can, and not being an aspirant for any higher position than that I now occupy, of course I must be assumed to act from motives different from those which would influence the Senator from Illinois.

But I do not think I have made any misstatement, and I certainly would not be guilty in any observations of mine of any disparagement of the State of Illinois, or anything in derogation of her honor or her integrity; but it occurs to me almost irresistibly that if the State of Illinois wanted that canal from Hennepin to the Mississippi River, why did she not take that $2,600,000 of profit in her treasury and go to work and begin to dig it?

The Senator intimates that this sum is the result of the tolls on the canal——

Mr. LOGAN. Tolls and profits.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well. Then it is not just, it is not a fair argument to state here that I said that these funds in the treasury of Illinois were derived from tolls on that canal. I read from a document that has the sanction of the governor of that State; it is not to be impugned by a statement from any source, and I will read it again, that there may be no misunderstanding about it, as its veracity has been called in question.

Mr. LOGAN. No; its veracity has not been called in question.

Mr. INGALLS. It is:

The entire cost of the canal in its construction is, principal and interest, $6,557,681.50.

Pretty tolerably minute. They evidently understood keeping accounts there, for they got the cost of that canal down to a 50-cent piece, and they give us the figures.

The amount of moneys received by the State from the sale of canal lands given by the United States is $5,886,039.68. This added to the net earnings of the canal, namely, $2,933,691.74, makes an aggregate of lands and lots sold, with the net earnings of the canal, the sum of $8,819,731.42 realized by the State, which shows a balance of $2,262,049.92 clear profits which were paid into the State treasury—

Not bled by contractors or plundered by officers, but put into the State treasury—which is more than one-third of its entire cost.

And beside this:

The canal itself and many millions' worth of real estate, part of said canal lands, yet belong to the State.

Mr. President, I repeat, that if this is a work of great national importance which the State of Illinois desired to retain and which they were operating at a profit, and if they desired further that this system should be continued to the Mississippi River, it is a little singular, when they had $2,262,000 of clear profit in their treasury and many millions' worth of valuable real estate belonging to the canal were yet in their possession, that they did not go to work and at least begin to build it, but on the contrary that they come here with a naked, bald proposition to keep this profit in their treasury, and to cede the canal that they have built out of the funds of the United States Government to Congress upon the condition that we shall take up the work where they have left off, continue it to the Mississippi River, and make it free to commerce.

Mr. President, one other curious thing about this business—and I think probably it is the solution of the problem—is that between the Illinois River at the town of Hennepin and the Mississippi River where this canal is to disembogue there is an elevation of land—I do not want to be inaccurate, because I may be criticised—something over 200 feet in height, and the distance I think is somewhere varying according to the route surveyed from 60 miles—the Senator from Missouri perhaps can tell me——

Mr. HAWLEY. From 75 to 101.

Mr. INGALLS. From 75 to 101 miles?

Mr. LOGAN. What?

Mr. CULLOM. From Hennepin to Rock Island by one route is 64 and by the other 77 miles.

Mr. LOGAN. One route is 64, one is 75, and one is 69.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it is from 64 to 75 miles. One route is 64, one 65.2, one 64.9, one 74.5, and one 77 miles—from 64 to 77 miles. I am told, and have read in authenticated statements submitted to Congress by engineers, that between the Illinois River and the Mississippi River there is a height of land in excess of 200 feet which this canal must cross. Am I correct?

Mr. CULLOM. Two hundred and eight feet.

Mr. INGALLS. Two hundred and eight feet, which must necessarily be crossed by a series of locks. It seems strange that in a prairie country, a region which is the typical prairie of the West, in order to ascertain a route for a water way in the State of Illinois between Lake Michigan at Chicago and the Mississippi River, they had to find a place where there was a 200 feet height in a State that I suppose contains a larger per cent. of level prairie than any other, so level that the complaint in many cases is that it does not drain sufficiently. And to complete a water way between the lakes and the Mississippi River through the State of Illinois it becomes necessary to select a route that has an elevation of 200 feet in a distance of from 64 to 77 miles.

Mr. President, it becomes a curious problem to understand where the water supply is to come from; but I am told that up on the summit of this ridge, supplied by nature and Providence, I presume upon the same theory that the Irishman mentioned when he said that great rivers usually flowed by large towns, there is a stream that they propose to continue along the ridge and empty at some point into this canal for the purpose of furnishing water on which this commerce is to be lifted up over this divide of 200 feet on its way from Chicago to the Mississippi River. Engineers who have examined this matter state that there is nowhere upon earth a water route that implies such enormously expensive construction as that which will be necessary to lift the commerce that is to be in this way furnished an easier route from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic by way of the lakes over this intervening obstacle of 208 feet, that is to be supplied, not by the waters of the lakes, not by the waters of the Mississippi River, but by a Providential feeder that flows down the summit of this ridge, which they propose to tap somewhere and discharge into the upper lock, I suppose to supply these gigantic aqueous spans on either side by which this commerce is to ascend and descend laboriously step by step between the Mississippi River and Chicago.

Mr. President, if the engineering difficulties of this scheme have not been overestimated, if we have not been made the victim of some beguilement, if these stories are not fictions written out of the Arabian Nights, I should say that a scheme which proposes to commit the United States Government to the expenditure of anywhere from ten to twenty-five million dollars to lift the commerce of the Northwest step by step up this gigantic water stairway 208 feet above the Mississippi River and then slowly step by step down this aqueous staircase allow it to escape to Chicago, was one of the most marvelous that ever entered into the mind of man to conceive.

Mr. HAWLEY. After getting down the 208 feet it has then got to rise again, before getting to Chicago, 140 feet.

Mr. INGALLS. And 140 feet more to Chicago. After they have got over the 208 feet, the 140 will be comparatively a matter of little difficulty.

It may be, Mr. President, that these things are all untrue. It may be that this statement which I have read from the governor of Illinois is merely a passing newspaper jest. It may be that these stories that I have been told about the engineering difficulties are no more accurate and reliable than the stories we hear about the canal that fed the hanging gardens of Babylon. But if they be true, if we are seriously to be called upon to take this project in hand and provide for the construction of this canal over the route that I have described and in the face of the engineering difficulties that have been detailed, I do not wonder that the State of Illinois was willing that the United States Government should take it if they would agree to construct it to the Mississippi River, and that they so declared upon a yea-and-nay vote in their Legislature.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator regard the Erie Canal as of any account to this country?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly I do.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator know how much lockage there is in it?

Mr. INGALLS. The Erie Canal is builded.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. The Erie Canal is constructed, in operation, and has been for I do not know how many years. As I said, I shall be entirely willing to take that canal and operate it.

Mr. CULLOM. It never would have been constructed if the Senator had lived at the time, I reckon.

Mr. INGALLS. That would depend on my capacity for endurance of speech.

Mr. CULLOM. I should think so.

Mr. INGALLS. That may possibly be.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator know how much lockage there is on that canal?

Mr. INGALLS. I am told there are sixteen locks at one place and twenty-six at another, and how many more in other places I do not know. But we are not talking about constructing the Erie Canal. That is builded. I said that if the government of New York would relinquish it, I would be glad to take it, locks and all, and provide for maintaining it and let commerce go through free of toll.

Mr. CULLOM. There happen to be seventy-two locks on it, and a lockage of 654 feet 4 inches.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; but how long is it?

Mr. CULLOM. Three hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. INGALLS. This is 64 miles; and you have 208 feet elevation in the 64 miles, and there they have 654 feet in 350 miles.

Mr. CULLOM. The proportion of lockage is not very different.

Mr. INGALLS. No; because the Senator from Connecticut informs me, and I rely on his accuracy, that in addition to the 208 feet on the 64 miles there is 140 feet more lockage between Hennepin and Chicago.

Mr. CULLOM. So there is.

Mr. INGALLS. Add those two together.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator would ask the question he would find that there was no loss of money on account of it there, that that canal is able to maintain itself with a railroad right alongside of it in combination with other railroads which try to destroy it.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have this accurate as we go on.

Mr. CULLOM. I have the information right here from the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. PLATT. From the Illinois River to the summit level there are twenty-three locks in a distance of 18 miles, aggregating a total lift of 205 feet and averaging 11.4 feet to the mile. That is in 18 miles.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, if the Senator from Kansas will kindly permit, I will give the entire lockage from Chicago to the river. On the old canal already built, which is to be enlarged, there are sixteen locks, with a descent of 141½ feet to Hennepin. Then if you take the Watertown route for the new canal, which is the average in length, as you go from Hennepin to the summit, there are to be twenty-three locks in 18 miles—205 feet by the table I have. Then descending from the summit to the Mississippi River by the medium route of the three there are nine locks and 86 feet of lockage. The total by the Rock Island route is 101; but take the Watertown route and there is between Chicago and the Mississippi River a lift of 432 feet in a distance by that route of 161 miles.

Mr. CULLOM. The Chief of Engineers says in his communication:

> I infer, therefore, that if business enough requires such water transportation there is nothing in the physical features of the undertaking to render it impracticable or prevent it from being a benefit to commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. In one of the sketches accompanying this report showing the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the different routes proposed of the Hennepin Canal is a profile of the different routes; and I wish, as a matter of curiosity, that those Senators who have an interest in this matter would examine it. The western profile from the Illinois River extending upward to the highest level of 208 feet by a series of locks appears to be about as nearly perpendicular as the apex of the Washington Monument; it is steeper than the roof of an ordinary house. Here they are. [Exhibiting.] Then there is a continuous line with one or two locks extending westward toward the Mississippi; and the design is by easier grades and from the plains on the Illinois River to the height of land 208 feet by the series of locks that are here designed. The locks are as consecutive as stairs on a staircase, and the profile shows a slope that is certainly an angle of 45°; and yet we are told that this offers such facilities for the transportation of the grain-growers of the Northwest that they are eager and hungry for this appropriation to be made. I can imagine after grain has been put on a freight train west of the Mississippi River and started for New York the eager alacrity with which every railroad will be directing its lines to the outlet of this canal for the purpose of discharging the corn and the grain and the cattle into the canal-boats of the Hennepin for the purpose of boosting them up over this 208 feet and lowering them down on the other side, and they ought to have a derrick and a lot of pulleys to do it so that they can reach Chicago by going over 140 feet more of the same kind.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not suppose that what I may say can effect anything; but after listening to the very remarkable speech of the very able Senator from Kansas, I am induced to make one or two suggestions.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me a moment that I may make one statement of figures? The Senator from Kansas charged upon the construction of this bill by the committee that they had favored the States to which they belong, and pointed out, if I have his figures right, that out of a bill of about fourteen millions $7,790,000 were expended in the States that had representatives on the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. That included the amendments.

Mr. HOAR. That would be a little less than one-half of the whole. Now I want to point out to that Senator that the population of those States aggregates 34,811,786 out of a total population according to the last census of 58,000,000. So on the Senator's own statement the committee, although they represent States whose commercial proportions are infinitely greater than their proportion by population, as will be seen by running over the list—Maine, Massachusetts, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, Texas—still they have in themselves a proportion very much less than would be their proportion according to population.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senate I desire to notice one or two very strange propositions made by the Senator from Kansas. He started out with the proposition that the State of Illinois is under obligation to the Government to complete the Hennepin Canal. The State of Illinois is not under any obligation, nor did she ever undertake an obligation, to complete the Hennepin Canal to Rock Island. There is no such thing in any proposition connected with the Illinois and Michigan Canal, so far as involving the State of Illinois in an obligation of that kind is concerned. If the Senator will examine he will find that he is mistaken in that.

The Senator says he did not say so. The Senator insisted that we were trying to impose upon the Government of the United States the completion of the canal from Hennepin to Rock Island, and asks why should we not do it ourselves? I say there is no such obligation and no such pretense was ever known or understood in reference to this canal.

In the next place, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the engineering capacity of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Kansas calls this the staircase canal. Let us see how much he knows about engineering; and certainly I do not know anything about it; but I am sure if he was employed by the Government he could make a plan so that we could understand it. He shows the profiles of this canal to the Senate, and he examines them with the horizontal and vertical scale. The horizontal scale is 1 inch to 9 miles, and the vertical scale 1 inch to 150 feet. That kind of engineering, of course, is something very complimentary to a man who understands the scale so perfectly as he does when he undertakes to show the absurdity of a canal of this character.

Now let us examine a little further. What is the proposition of the State of Illinois? Instead of the State of Illinois attempting to impose upon the Government of the United Statee, the fact is that years ago a committee from the Congress of the United States traveled all over this country for the purpose of examining the best mode of opening up water routes for transportation purposes. That committee embraced in its report the Hennepin Canal. That committee embraced in its report the proposition that the Hennepin Canal could be made so as to connect the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, making a direct route from the Mississippi River to Chicago, from Chicago across the lakes, through the Erie Canal to New York, giving a water way from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean. These propositions were placed before the country.

The question then arose, Illinois having completed the Illinois and Michigan Canal, how the Government of the United States should obtain possession of that canal. Illinois proposed then if the Government of the United States desired, which they believed was of great interest to the whole commerce of the West, that they would cede this canal to the Government provided the Government would make it a ship-canal.

I do not wish to enter into the details of the thing for the reason that it has been amplified by my colleague to such an extent that I could not give any facts in connection with it that would illustrate the case any more perfectly than he has done, and perhaps not so well.

The Government of the United States had granted to the State of Illinois a certain amount of land provided Illinois would build a canal and connect the lakes with the Illinois River. Illinois accepted the land grant. The State of Illinois built the canal and the State has operated the canal. The State has expended about $6,000,000 in building the canal, a little over a million more than was produced from the sale of the lands. The canal is not wide enough for a ship-canal. It afforded all the facilities that were required at that time for transporting such things as were produced in that part of the country, but at this time it is not sufficient, and for the purpose of making this great water way from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean as near as may be it is now proposed to make it a ship-canal and to continue it from Hennepin to the Mississippi River.

The Senator says he would be perfectly willing to accept the Erie Canal. That takes commodities from Lake Erie to the Hudson River, where it connects with water transportation to New York city and the sea. He is willing to do that; but if you do that the connection is not made until you connect with the Mississippi River, so that the products of the Northwest shall have an outlet by a water route as well as by railroad. That, in a few words, is the object of this whole thing, and was the proposition made first—not sought by the people of Illinois, as he charges, but suggested by a committee that made the examination for the Congress of the United States as one means of having a great water route from the West to the seaboard.

But so soon as the proposition was made and the State of Illinois took action through her Legislature to comply with the suggestion that had been made, the railroads in that part of the country and every one interested in them commenced a warfare upon the Hennepin Canal, and from that day to this it has been attacked in the same manner that it has been to-day. These attacks do not come always merely from the feeling that exists in reference to its being an objectionable proposition, but the influence of nearly every railroad in the Northwest has fought this proposition from that day to this, and every one friendly to the railroads has done the same thing. I have no fight against railroads nor against the friends of railroads, but I ask them to keep their hands off propositions that are for the benefit of the American people.

The Senator from Kansas says that this is an attempt to filch from the Treasury of the United States from ten to twenty million dollars. That is another evidence of his qualifications as an engineer. This canal has been surveyed time and again. I presume it has been surveyed by engineers a dozen times and perhaps more. Five or six different reports have been made in reference to the different routes between the Mississippi River and Hennepin connecting with the Illinois and Michigan Canal at that point, and each and every engineer officer who has made a report has reported that the route is feasible, and not only feasible, but the highest estimate placed by the engineers, who have made three or four surveys within the last two years, has been $7,000,000, and that includes the feeder that the Senator spoke of in such a criticising manner as he did when he spoke of its tumbling down the staircase of this canal.

Now, let us see how the Senator's statement compares with the statement of the engineers who have surveyed this route and made their estimates. The estimated cost of constructing the canal and feeder, including the right of way, is $5,811,367.50 for one route, the Marais d'Osier. The estimate for the Watertown route is $7,207,646.88, including all expenses, cost of feeder, right of way, and everything connected with the construction and completion of the canal. The estimate for the Rock Island route amounts to $6,672,890.67.

As I said, the highest estimate for either of these routes, for the most costly one, including the right of way, feeders, locks, and everything connected with it, is a little over $7,000,000. The Senate must say whether we shall take the estimates of engineers when we come to compare them with the statements of a Senator who knows more about canals than any man I have known for a long time. If his statements are correct or if what he says about this canal is true, the engineers are all crazy. Of course the engineers would not say such a thing about him, nor would they say that he had misrepresented, but they would certainly say that he was mistaken.

The statement has been made that the governor of Illinois had made a report to the President of the United States and showed that he wanted to get rid of this canal, and for that purpose wanted it dumped on the people of the United States, and that $2,000,000 had been made by the State of Illinois, and that therefore we expected to speculate to that extent. I will say that the lands to-day that would be returned to the Government of the United States under this proposition I have not the slightest doubt are of more value than the amount it took to complete that canal; and yet the State of Illinois proposes to cede back everything that the Government gave to the State except that portion which was expended in the construction and completion of the canal. What more could a State do? What more would a State be asked to do than to return everything received from the Government except that which had been expended?

But it is said the State of Illinois received a small pittance by way of tolls, &c., and therefore it is not acting fair because it does not propose to give that up, too. I did not know the Government wanted it, and nobody thought of it. It is a matter for the Government of the United States represented in Congress to do just as it pleases about this proposition. But I will say if you ever have a through water route from the seaboard to the West, which one day will come, this will be the route and no other. It is the only opening that can be made cheaply from the Mississippi River to Chicago, where it strikes the lakes, by taking the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which is 96 miles in length and a fine canal, too, widening it, and connecting this with it. It is the only way the Government can ever open a water route to the seaboard from the Western country.

Mr. President, so far as this river and harbor bill is concerned it seems to have been attacked pretty generally. I have naught to say about that. I do not propose to discuss it at this time especially, nor do I expect to do it hereafter; but this one proposition seems to have been selected by certain Senators here to make a raid upon the whole bill, and not only that, but especially upon this part of it.

I do not intend to detain the Senate further than to say that if the fact that this canal itself, when presented to the country as it has been, does not make an argument sufficient to induce Members of Congress and Senators to vote for a small appropriation so as to accept the proposition of the State of Illinois, there is no argument that I can make in favor of it which would induce them to do so.

It is the cheapest route from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean. It will be a benefit to all the people in the Northwest, whether they are producers or consumers. It will be a route coming in competition with railroad routes, and it will to that extent reduce freights, and to that extent it will benefit everybody.

One fact which has been stated here proves what I say to be true. While the Illinois and Michigan Canal is open in the summer freights are lower on the railroads than they are when the canal is closed. Why is that? It is because there is at that time no competition with the railroads. And if the railroads and their interests can prevent the Government of the United States from taking hold of this work and building it, to that extent they are profited, and they can do as they have always done, fix their own rates, make their combinations, and deprive the producers of that country of profits on their products, if this proposition is defeated, which has been the case for years and will continue to be so.

The Senator's own State is interested in this. All the Western and Northwestern country is interested in it, and no matter what he may say that nevertheless is true.

I have said all I desire to say in reference to this question. It is not, as has been said, that Illinois is trying to dump this thing on the people of the United States and take from the Treasury millions of dollars. This canal is for the benefit of commerce, for the benefit of the country, for the benefit of all the people of the Northwest. I know that my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has an idea, that is covered up neatly, that it will somehow or other injure Saint Louis, and that therefore the people of Saint Louis must oppose the Hennepin Canal. It can not affect the city of Saint Louis in the slightest degree. That is beginning to be a great railroad center now from the Northwest to the Mississippi River, and the people of Illinois have been as free always in giving appropriations for the Mississippi River as any class of representatives that you will find in the United States; and it was a report that I made as the head of a committee that examined that river which caused one of the largest appropriations ever made for it. We have always been the friends of clearing out obstructions in and opening that great channel of commerce for the benefit of the Northwest; and we do feel that it does sometimes come in a way that is unexpected to us when we find in this little improvement that is calculated to advance the interests of our State and the Northwest country north of that portion where the Senator resides that it is attacked just in the manner it has been here in the Senate.

This same proposition was adopted in the Senate at one time on a river and harbor bill. The very proposition that we make to-day was in a river and harbor bill which passed the Senate some years ago, but it was stricken from the bill by a conference committee. It was then considered by the Senate of great importance; but in conference, owing to some influence or other, God knows what, much to the surprise of all of us it was stricken off, and at a late hour of the session the bill passed without it, the conference report being agreed to.

So we have found year after year the same character of opposition not only in the Senate, but outside of it and surrounding it. Senators here honestly oppose the measure because they think it is not a proper work for the Government to undertake. But the influences outside oppose it because they believe it will be inimical to their interests and will cause their profits to be less.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, I have been surprised at one proposition made by the Senator from Kansas to the effect that the benefit arising from cheap transportation of wheat inures alone to the consumer and that the producer gains nothing.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not say that. My proposition was that a reduction in rates of transportation was not followed by an increase of the price of the article produced at the point where it is produced. I did not say there was no benefit from cheapening transportation.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I certainly understood that to be the proposition, nor does the Senator's explanation materially change it. Now, this can not be correct, because the price of wheat in the Liverpool market is regulated not by the price of transportation in this country but from the competition from other countries, Australia, India, Russia, and Western Asia.

The pending question is on the amendment of the committee relative to the proposed improvement known as the Hennepin Canal. I am heartily in favor of this great national work. And I may as well at this as any other time state my reasons for favoring a river and harbor bill making liberal appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country. And I can, perhaps, better than in any other way illustrate my views by discussing the question with reference to the proposed appropriations in this bill for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the Pacific Northwest.

The amendments of the committee to the House appropriations for continuation of improvements at the mouth of the Columbia and the Cascades of the Columbia may very properly be discussed together, as they both relate to the improvement of navigation facilities on the one great river.

The amendment increasing the amounts for the construction of the improvements at the harbor of Yaquina may also very properly be considered at the same time and in the same connection, as the effect of the completion of that work—and of the Oregon Pacific Railroad, now completed and in operation from Yaquina to the heart of the great Willamette Valley—must inevitably, in connection with a free river, tend immensely not only to the reduction of transportation charges on freight to and from the Willamette Valley but also on the products of the Great Basin of the Columbia, for the transportation of a goodly portion of which it will in the near future be a powerful competitor.

The estimates of the Engineer Department of the amounts that can be profitably expended in these important improvements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, are as follows: At the mouth of the Columbia, $1,330,000; on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, $750,000; on the harbor at Yaquina, $160,000. The bill as it came from the House appropriated for the former but $150,000, or less than 12 per cent. of the amount of the estimates, and for the Cascades Canal and Locks $200,000, or less than 27 per cent. of the estimates; and for Yaquina, $80,000, or 50 per cent. of the estimates. The Senate Committee on Commerce have added $100,000 to the former and $50,000 to the appropriation for the canal and locks, and $20,000 additional for Yaquina; so that the bill as it will stand should these amendments be concurred in by the Senate, will appropriate for the mouth of the Columbia $250,000, or a fraction less than 20 per cent. of the estimates; for the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, $250,000, or precisely 33⅓ per cent. of the estimates, and for the Yaquina Harbor $100,000, or about 63 per cent. of the estimates.

The questions now presented are: Should these amendments be adopted? Are they reasonable and just? Are they consistent with the general theory of this bill and with other proposed appropriations for works of equal national importance? The most cursory examination will show that each of these queries must be answered in the affirmative.

While it is perhaps true that it may require some effort to reconcile some of the proposed appropriations in this bill with the constitutional requirements to which appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors should conform, in the case of the proposed appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia River and the Yaquina Harbor there can on this score be no room for doubt, no opportunity for speculation. Here every constitutional requirement is fully, fairly, and completely met. Against either the constitutional power, the absolute justice, or entire propriety of these appropriations every suggestion and argument and assault, whether from constitutional lawyers, reform statesmen, or carping critics must, viewed from whatever standpoint, fall wholly ineffectual and harmless.

The immense importance of these national improvements to the commercial interests of the Pacific Northwest can not well be overestimated. The amounts necessary to their completion—and I speak first of the appropriations for the improvement of navigation on the Columbia, and shall discuss Yaquina Harbor later on—are but infinitesimal drops in the mighty ocean of physical and commercial development, material prosperity, and political and social power, the creation and establishment of which must inevitably result as a necessary consequence from the completion of these improvements and the opening up to free, unrestricted, and untrammeled navigation the waters of this, one of the grandest among the many grand rivers of the world. Indeed, so vast are the interests of the present and future generations that are involved in the opening of the Columbia River to a free and unfettered commerce that neither the pen of prophecy, the prescience of gifted statesmen, nor the most penetrating genius of man can even measurably foresee or comprehend or describe them. If by any feeble efforts of mine I may in part be instrumental in contributing to this great end I shall have realized one of the grandest ambitions of my life, the realization of which for over a quarter of a century has, whether in public or private life, been one of the brightest dreams and grandest hopes of my existence.

To those who have never traversed the great valley of the Columbia, who have never in person or through reliable books or proper data explored what is commonly known as the Great Columbia Basin, or inland empire, or contemplated its present productions, its immeasurable resources, or the almost incomprehensible vastness of its susceptibilities and future possibilities under the more favorable circumstances that will attach when the freedom to navigation of the Columbia River shall have been thoroughly established by the completion of these and other like or equally important improvements at The Dalles of the Columbia, the true story of the magnitude, the productiveness, the susceptibilities, the grandeur of this mighty empire must appear as the recital of one of the tales of the Arabian Nights. And herein lies the great difficulty with which Senators and Representatives from the State and Territories of that distant region have to contend in bringing to the Senators and Representatives in the East and South a proper comprehension and realizing sense of the facts so important to be properly understood in connection with the proposed appropriations for the improvement of the Columbia River. And indeed it may not inappropriately or untruthfully be said that not the least of these difficulties to be overcome is to be found in the fact that a fair and impartial statement of these facts, relative to the magnitude of the country to be developed, its unparalleled fertility, its great productiveness, its healthful climate, its unbounded resources, and its grand scenery and climatic attractions, together with the enormity of the burdens now imposed on the producers and shippers of that magnificent region, in the matter of excessive and grossly exorbitant freight charges, and unjust discriminations that are being practiced; and the great relief that a free river would necessarily bring to the present and future producers and shippers of that country seems so unreal, and to the uninformed so apparently incorrect and exaggerated, as to create in the mind a sense of incredulity, if not indeed of absolute disbelief.

Whenever, therefore, I essay to speak of these things I find myself under a feeling of constant restraint and inclined to hesitation, being apprehensive that the statement of facts as they really are may have a contrary effect from that intended. First, however, let it be understood that by reason of the obstructions to navigation at the Cascades of the Columbia and The Dalles of the Columbia, the Columbia River being the only real pass through which the productions of the Great Columbia Basin or inland empire can find their way to the seaboard, it has been made possible for one corporation engaged in the business of transportation to intrench itself as a powerful, relentless and, I was about to say, remorseless tax-gatherer and collector of tribute at these gates of commerce on this grand river, and thus absolutely control the navigation of the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries from their source to the sea, and dictate the terms of its commerce. Nor is it strange that business genius and capital were not slow to comprehend the commercial and strategic importance of these passes in the mountains, and obtain absolute and undisputed possession of this "key point," to use the descriptive language of the United States engineer in charge of the improvements of the Columbia River, "in the commercial strategy of the Pacific Northwest."

For years, and from the earliest period of the establishment of civilization in the far West, this corporation, the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and its immediate predecessor, the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, have held undisputed sway over the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries, with no restraint or restriction whatever on their power, discretion, or disposition in the establishment of rates of transportation to which the producers and shippers are subjected, save and except one, and that is the ability and willingness of the producer or shipper to respond to their demand. That this corporation have provided most important and valuable facilities for transportation both by boats and rail at a great expenditure of money is admitted by all; that this money, however, has in the main come from the producers of that region is equally true; that their facilities, notwithstanding their substantial nature, are insufficient to move in proper season the products of the inland empire, failing in 1884 to the extent of 35,000 tons, is admitted by all; that their freight rates, moreover, now and for years past have been such as to amount to a sum annually far beyond any reasonable, fair, or just, or even an extravagant interest on every dollar expended after meeting every proper charge and keeping their transportation lines in good condition, is a question that even the managers of that powerful company would be loath to deny, and which is, moreover, a fact open to absolute and positive demonstration by indisputable evidence. That the people of an empire located on the banks of one of the grandest rivers of the world should in the matter of transportation of their products and supplies be held subject to the will of one corporation is contrary to every principle of fair play, justice, and right that should find countenance, respect, or toleration among intelligent and civilized men.

That the waters of any one river on God's green earth, much less one so grandly magnificent in volume, length, and every other respect as the Columbia, endowed with all those elements of greatness and grandeur, and moral and physical power that constitute and characterize the greatest of the great internal water ways of the world, should be dominated and controlled by any one man or any one set of men, or corporation, or company, is a standing reproach to the people or nation that tolerates or permits it, and all this must be said and is said without casting any personal reflection upon the men engaged in the business of transportation along this great river, or who compose the stockholders and managers of this corporation, and who have been so fortunate as to obtain control at an early day of this most important key to the commerce of the Pacific Northwest.

To change this order of things, and to more nearly equalize the rights, interests, and profits of the producer, consumer, shipper, and transporter in the great valley of the Columbia, to open up the waters of this great river to honorable competition, healthy commerce, and business rivalry in the matter of transportation, and of free and untrammeled navigation, are the great purposes of these appropriations.

THE INLAND EMPIRE.

But what of the magnitude and character of the area of the Columbia River region and of the arable field of what is most generally known as the Columbia Basin or great inland empire, and which are to be developed by a free river, and whose producers are to be relieved from transportation burdens which amount to-day almost to an absolute embargo on production? The area drained by the Columbia River, we are told by the report of the Chief of Engineers on our desks, is estimated at 245,000 square miles—an area he correctly states larger than all the New England and Middle States, with Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia thrown in—all these States combined having an area of but 244,260 square miles. The area drained by the Columbia River and its tributaries is twice as large as Great Britain and Ireland, more than twice the size of Italy, half as large again as Spain, and many thousand square miles greater than either France, Germany, or Austria-Hungary, and greater than all the islands of the seas combined.

Snake River alone, a tributary of the Columbia, flowing into it over 300 miles from the sea, drains an area of nearly 105,000 square miles, and its valleys are among the most fertile and productive on earth; while the Upper Columbia, above the junction with the Snake, drains an area of 97,155 square miles, and the main stream of the Columbia, below the Snake junction, 43,200 square miles. The engineer in charge of the works on the Columbia, in speaking of this vast area, uses the following language:

It has been demonstrated that nearly the whole of this great plain is a magnificent grain-producing country, as the statistics submitted herewith will show. Furthermore, the soil is not only fertile, but of extraordinary endurance. In the Willamette Valley the fields that have been continually cropped with wheat for twenty years are now yielding from 30 to 35 bushels per acre of winter wheat.

When it is considered that, in addition to its grain-producing capacity, this region has ample resources in precious metals, coal, iron, and most of the various products that go to make up that interweaving of a great variety of industries which always insures the development of wealth and prosperity, it becomes evident that the mountain gorge that commands the whole trade of such a country is worthy of considerable attention from Congress. The development of this region will add so rapidly to the material wealth of the nation, and add so largely to its revenues, it is thought that every dollar expended will come back many fold into the public Treasury.

The obstructions to navigation through this gorge occur at The Dalles and at the Cascades. At the latter place the works for improvement are approaching completion.

But coming to speak more properly of what is known as the Columbia River Basin or inland empire, as separate and apart, and distinguished from the still larger area drained by the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries—I refer to that area of most remarkably fertile and marvelously productive country located between the Cascade range of mountains on the west and the Cœur D'Alene and Bitter Root Mountains on the east with the Blue Mountains to the south and the Colville Mountains to the north—we find an area, the very large proportion of which is magnificent arable land, of over 25,000 square miles in extent, or about 25,000,000 acres, all susceptible of a high degree of cultivation; a more attractive and substantial region than is the valley proper of the Mississippi, extending 1,097 miles by the flow of the Mississippi from Cairo to the Gulf, for in that great valley is embraced an area of but 41,000 square miles, while of these 32,000 square miles are liable to overflow. And the products, present and prospective, of this great area must find their way to the seaboard along the waters of the Columbia River. At least must this be so until the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad across the Cascade Mountains to Puget Sound, or the completion of the Oregon Pacific, connecting the Columbia Basin with the Pacific Ocean at Yaquina Bay. But even when this is done, in order that combinations between the two or three or more railroad companies—the Northern Pacific, the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, the Oregon Pacific, and Oregon Short Line or Union Pacific—for the purpose of maintaining freight rates at high figures and controlling the transportation of that country may be rendered impossible, it becomes a matter of the first importance to the people of the inland empire that the waters of the Columbia River and its tributaries should be freed from obstructions from their mouths to their source at the earliest possible date and opened to free navigation. This done, and the power of any one railroad company or any two or more corporations to dictate freight charges to the producer of that country will be forever at an end. The great importance of these improvements and the value of free navigation on the Columbia and its tributaries will be emphasized when it is stated that by these we have a total inland navigation for vessels of various classes for a distance of about 1,686 miles, as follows:

By the main Columbia River 1,032 miles, 752 miles of which are within the United States; Pend O'Reille River, 180 miles; Clear Water, 40 miles; Kootenay, 100 miles; Willamette, 172 miles; and Snake River, 162 miles. And while at present much less than one-tenth of the cultivable soil of this great inland empire is under cultivation, and while the population of the Basin of the Columbia does not exceed at present more than two human souls to the square mile, or only about one-ninth of the average population to the square mile in the United States, the product of this area for the year 1885 in the matter of cereals alone (wheat, oats, and barley, but principally wheat) amounts to about 14,000,000 bushels—the ground producing on an average over 30 bushels per acre of winter wheat, and from 20 to 25 bushels per acre of spring wheat, or considerably more than double the average product per acre of the United States or the world, while in some instances even on tracts of considerable magnitude the yield has been from 50 to 60 and even 75 bushels per acre and even more, while I am credibly informed as much as 100 bushels have been raised in more than one instance on choice spots under exceptionably favorable circumstances. It is estimated that the area generally referred to as the Columbia Basin or inland empire is capable of producing when properly cultivated over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum.

But to the magnitude of the area of this fertile field, and the prolific character of its productions, the vastness of its undeveloped resources, must be added the fact of the extraordinary endurance of its soil. It is of that peculiar character and depth of formation as to cause it to retain through an indefinite number of years, although subjected to constant annual drains from successive crops of the same character, that vis vitæ essential to continued healthful and prolific production. The soil averages from 12 inches to forty, fifty, sixty, and even hundreds of feet in depth; and by actual experiment soil taken from a depth of 40 feet and placed on the surface and exposed to the climatic action of the sun and atmosphere has produced an abundant crop of wheat. Fertilizing the soil of this region by artificial means is as unheard of in the Great Basin of the Columbia as it is unnecessary and useless; and this is true of irrigation as to the greater portion of it. Giving the field over to rest, clover, and lime, or other fertilizing influences every two or three years, as is the custom in the East, find no recognition in the life and practice of the farmer in the wheat-producing empire of the Columbia. The great fact I desire to impress and the lesson sought to be imparted by these statements may receive proper support and emphasis by a quotation from an interesting report made some three years since on the character and resources of the Great Plain of the Columbia by Lieutenant Symons of the United States Engineer Corps. I quote from his report. He says:

Over nearly the whole of this Great Plain of the Columbia there is now spread a rich and fertile soil, varying in depth from a few inches to hundreds of feet. This soil has been the product of the grinding action of the ice and drift of the Glacial epoch, by the water-wearing of the Champlain epoch, and from the disintegration of the rocks during the last and present existing Terrace epoch, by the action of summer's rain and heat, winter's frost and cold, and the chemical decomposition arising from exposure to the atmosphere.

Maj. William A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, now in charge of improvement on the Columbia River, in his recent interesting and able report (Senate Executive Document No. 114, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), after reciting the above from Lieutenant Symons's report, says:

Since the date of this report it has been demonstrated that nearly the whole of this great plain is a magnificent grain-producing country, as the statistics submitted herewith will show. Furthermore, the soil is not only fertile, but of extraordinary endurance. In the Willamette Valley fields that have been continually cropped with wheat for twenty years are now yielding from 30 to 35 bushels per acre of winter wheat.

When it is considered that in addition to its grain-producing capacity, this region has ample resources in precious metals, coal, iron, and most of the various products that go to make up that interweaving of a great variety of industries which always insures the development of wealth and prosperity, it becomes evident that the mountain gorge that commands the whole trade of such a country is worthy of considerable attention from Congress. The development of this region will add so rapidly to the material wealth of the nation, and add so largely to its revenues, that every dollar expended will come back many fold into the public Treasury.

While General Nimmo, late Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, in discussing this subject in his annual report of May 6, 1885, on the internal commerce of the United States, on page —, says:

Several years ago the soil of this region was subjected to chemical analysis, and it was found to be possessed of properties which have rendered the soil of the island of Sicily susceptible to wheat culture for more than two thousand years.

But the immense wealth of this grand area is not limited by any means to the production of cereals. It is unsurpassed in the matter of stock production and in the products of beef and wool, and butter and other dairy products, to say nothing of its stores of mineral wealth, of coal and the precious metals, which are rapidly swelling the volume of exports that must find their way to the seaboard. The rapid increase of sheep-raising and wool-production in the State of Oregon in the last few years has been marvelous. Eleven years ago, on January 1, 1875, the total number of sheep in the State of Oregon was but 634,400, while on the 1st of January, 1885, ten years afterward, they numbered 2,519,950, or an increase in one decade of nearly 400 per cent., while in the same period oxen and other cattle and milch cows had increased from 205,000 to 620,565. These are the estimates contained in the annual reports of the Department of Agriculture. The following estimate is, as to a portion of the locality under discussion, made by a gentleman residing in that section and thoroughly acquainted with the subject of which he speaks. I refer to Hon. John P. Wager, recently elected to the State senate from Umatilla and Morrow Counties. I quote from his statement:

I estimate that there are in the Oregon part of the Columbia Basin alone, south of the Columbia, not including any portion of Crook, Grant, Baker or Union Counties, which are devoted chiefly to this industry, not less than forty-five thousand horses, not counting last spring's colts; forty-three thousand cattle, not counting last spring's calves, and six hundred thousand sheep, not counting lambs; and that the wool-clip last spring was not less than 6,000,000 pounds. If we add the portions of Baker, Grant, and Crook Counties naturally tributary to the Columbia, these figures will be nearly doubled—probably more than doubled as to cattle. A rough guess as to the whole basin might be made by multiplying these figures by four or five; then multiply the number by the price, and you can begin to get an idea as to the dimensions of the stock industry in the inland empire.

THE EXORBITANT NATURE OF TRANSPORTATION TARIFFS ON THE PRODUCTS OF THE COLUMBIA BASIN.

In order that the Senate may have some proper conception of the enormous freight charges on the Columbia River and on the line of the railroad coursing the banks of that river and operated by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, I desire to attract attention to the rates on a few of the distances on these lines, and they are not very short hauls, and compare them for a moment with transportation charges on other lines in different sections of the country. For instance, from Wallula Junction, Wash., to Portland, in the State of Oregon, a distance of 214 miles, a charge of $6 per ton for wheat is exacted. This is at the rate of 18 cents per bushel for this distance, or at the rate of nearly 3 cents per ton per mile.

Again, from Portland to Alkali, or Arlington, as it is now called, on the Columbia River, in Gilliam County, Oregon, a distance of 142 miles, a charge of 65 cents per 100 pounds on first-class freight is imposed, being at the rate of $13 per ton for that distance, or about 9⅛ cents per ton per mile; while from Portland to Castle Rock, on the same line, a distance of 162 miles, or about 20 miles further than to Arlington, the same class of freight on the same line is charged 90 cents per 100 pounds, or at the rate of $18 per ton for this distance, or at the rate of 11⅛ cents per ton per mile; or, in other words, for the additional distance of 20 miles between Alkali and Castle Rock an additional charge of $5 per ton is exacted for first-class freight, or at the rate for this distance of 25 cents per ton per mile.

Again, from Dalles City to Portland, Oreg., a distance of 88 miles, a charge of 12 cents per bushel is made for transporting wheat, being at the rate of $4 per ton for this distance, or at the rate of 4½ cents per ton per mile.

It will be observed I have selected for illustrations the rates between Portland, Oreg., and four several, separate, and distinct points located on and along the Columbia River, east of the Cascade range of mountains, in the basin of the Columbia River; that is to say, Dalles City, 88 miles east from Portland; Alkali (or Arlington), 142 miles east from Portland; Castle Rock, 162 miles east from Portland, and Wallula Junction, Wash., 214 miles east from Portland. From these instances a fair knowledge may be obtained of freight charges generally on the lines of rail and steamers connecting the head of ship navigation at Portland, Oreg., with the Great Columbia Basin, or what is commonly known and called in that section the great inland empire.

But still further let us inquire into the position in which the farmers in the Walla Walla and portions of Eastern Washington and Oregon are placed who might desire to ship their grain to Minneapolis and the East. While the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company will take their wheat, barley, and oats to Portland over their line, a distance of say 250 miles, at $6 per ton, they will charge them if they wish to ship to Minneapolis, via Wallula and the Northern Pacific Railroad, $2.40 per ton for the 30 miles from Walla Walla to Wallula, or at the rate of 7¾ cents per bushel, or at the rate of 8 cents per ton per mile.

Can, I inquire, such enormous transportation charges or such unreasonable and unjust discriminations be found to exist in any other part of the United States? I imagine not. Compare these even with the freight charges in the State of California, of which we have heard so much complaint in regard to alleged exorbitant exactions, and what do we find? Take the matter of the transportation of freight, for instance, from the valley of the Sacramento to San Francisco. The distance from Marysville, Cal., to San Francisco is, via Benicia, 142 miles, or precisely the same distance it is from Portland, Oreg., to Alkali or Arlington, or via Stockton and Niles, 192 miles, and via Stockton and Port Costa, 203 miles. The principal portion of the freight (cereals) goes via Benecia, as it is much the shorter route. The rate has been generally heretofore (I am not advised as to the present time) from Marysville via Benicia, a distance of 142 miles, $2.90 per ton, or equivalent to about 2 cents per ton per mile, while via Stockton it is about $3.30 per ton, or about 1⅔ cents per ton per mile.

While it is true these seem somewhat extravagant charges, and are such compared with rates in most parts of the United States by rail or water, yet they are less than one-half on an average those to which the producers of the Columbia River are subjected. But taking a longer haul we find the average charge by rail from San Francisco to New Orleans, a distance of about 2,500 miles, $10 per ton, or only about 4 mills, or forty hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or only about the one twenty-eighth part per ton per mile charged for freights between Portland and Castle Rock on the Columbia River. The cost of transporting grain from San Francisco to Liverpool via New Orleans in 1884 was $12 per ton, a distance of over 6,000 miles, while the producers of the Columbia Basin are compelled to pay half that amount per ton for transporting their wheat a distance of about 200 miles.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company, I believe, transports wheat from Wallula Junction to Duluth, a distance of 1,674 miles, for $8 per ton, but little less than 5 mills per ton per mile, while from Wallula Junction to Portland, Oreg., a distance of 214 miles over the same line of road, a charge of 3 cents per ton per mile, or a rate six times greater per ton per mile, is exacted by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and I believe also by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, running its trains over the same line. From Duluth to Liverpool via Montreal wheat was in 1884 transported at $5.61 per ton, and from Portland by way of Cape Horn to Liverpool, a distance of nearly 17,000 miles, at $8 per ton, while a much greater sum than the former and a fraction less than the latter is charged for a distance of 200 miles in and along the Valley of the Columbia.

A comparison of these various transportation charges demonstrates beyond the power of controversy the exorbitant nature of the transportation charges imposed to-day by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon the producers and shippers interested in transportation to and from the great valley of the Columbia. It is not to be wondered at that the earnings of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company were for the year ending June 30, 1884, $5,364,906.52, derived chiefly from local traffic, or that their earnings since then have been still greater.

But a few more comparisons will illustrate in a marked degree the extravagant freight charges that rule to-day in the valley of the Columbia. The average freight charges per bushel for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to New York, a distance of 963 miles, by all water—that is by the lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River; by part water and part rail—that is by lake to Buffalo and by rail to New York; and by all rail during the years 1876 to 1883, inclusive, were, on an average, as follows, and they are much less now: By all water 10 cents per bushel; by lakes and rail 12.4 cents, and by all rail 17.1 cents. Making no allowance for difference between a long and a short haul, and it is conceded that may be properly taken into account in favor of the transportation company, the charges on and along the Columbia River are on an average from five to eight times higher per bushel than from Chicago to New York. At the rates ruling along the Columbia River on hauls of two to three hundred miles it would cost from 85 to 90 cents a bushel to transport a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York, or at the rate of from $28.33\frac{1}{3}$ to $30 per ton.

But, coming down later, we find the present transportation rates ruling on transportation lines between Chicago and New York as follows:

By all-water, 6 cents a bushel for wheat, or at the rate of $2 per ton for a distance of 963 miles, or at the rate of $2\frac{1}{12}$ mills per ton per mile, or, making no allowance for difference in length of hauls, a rate of over fourteen times less per ton per mile or per bushel per mile than is charged on wheat from the Columbia Basin to Portland, Oreg., while by all-rail the present cost (1886) of transporting wheat from Chicago to New York, 963 miles, is 15 cents a bushel, or $5 per ton for that distance, or at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ mills per ton per mile, or, making no allowance for difference in length of hauls, a rate less than one-sixth of that charged in the Columbia River Valley per bushel per mile.

And this illustration shows, moreover, the superiority of a water route over a railroad for the transportation of wheat and other produce of the country, as it will be seen from this that to-day it costs only two-fifths as much to transport a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York by all-water as it does by all-rail.

THE GRAIN AND WOOL AND STOCK PRODUCT OF THE INLAND EMPIRE, AND THE IMPORTANCE OF A FREE RIVER.

While the wheat product of Oregon twenty-five years ago did not exceed 900,000 bushels, in 1884 it had, notwithstanding all the disadvantages of high rates of transportation, high wages, and other obstructions and embarrassments incident to the frontier State, reached the marvelous amount of 15,462,000 bushels, or an increase in that time of over 1,500 per cent. A glance at the free water ways of the country, where competition rules and monopoly by reason thereof is impossible, must convince all of the immense importance to the producers and shippers of the country of free navigable water ways. Coal, for instance, is transported from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, a distance of over 2,000 miles, for 3 cents per bushel; and it is frequently transported at from 60 to 75 cents per ton. It is carried from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati and Louisville and Cairo and other points at from 1 to 2 cents a bushel, or from 30 to 60 cents per ton. Corn is shipped from Chicago to Buffalo, a distance of 400 miles, for 87 cents per ton.

According to the report of Lieut. Col. D. C. Houston, Corps of Engineers, to the board of engineers of date October 16, 1883, the tariff for grain of the Northwestern Tariff Association, comprising the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway; the Chicago, Saint Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha Railway; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway; Minneapolis and Saint Louis Railway; Chicago and Northwestern Railway; Chicago and Rock Island and Pacific Railway; Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway, and Rock Island and Peoria Railway, between Saint Paul or Minneapolis and Chicago, Milwaukee, Saint Louis, and intermediate points, is 20 cents per 100 pounds for wheat and flour, and $17\frac{1}{2}$ for coarse grains, the distance varying from 324 to 526 miles, while the joint freight tariff in that year on the following roads, Chicago and Northwestern Railway; Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway; Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway; Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway; and Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway, from Cedar Rapids to Chicago, is 20 cents per 100 pounds, the distance varying from 219 to 314 miles, and the local tariffs on these roads for distances over 100 miles is substantially the same. Careful examination will show these charges to be considerably less than one-half the rates imposed for transportation down the Columbia on long hauls of from 150 to 300 miles in length. And yet we find the representatives from the Mississippi River Valley west of Chicago here protesting against these rates as ruinous and exorbitant when compared with rates between Chicago and New York, and all of which is true, and as a remedial measure are urging the construction of the Hennepin Canal.

But coming still farther East we find, as I shall show more particularly in a moment, wheat being transported by the New York Central from Buffalo to New York in 1883 and for years previous by all rail for eighty-eight hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, and by water via the Erie Canal and Hudson River for twenty-seven hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, while on the Erie Railway all first-class freight is hauled for 4 mills per ton per mile. On the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern at seventy-five hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, and on the Michigan Central eighty-four hundredths of a cent per ton per mile. While as I have heretofore shown the cost the present year—1886—to transport wheat from Chicago to New York is by all water but 6 cents a bushel, or $2\frac{1}{12}$ mills per ton per mile, and by all rail but 15 cents a bushel, or $5\frac{1}{6}$ mills per ton per mile. In view therefore of these comparisons, from which it becomes apparent to all that freight charges on the present transportation lines in the far West are ruinously extravagant and without a parallel in this or any other country, why should there be any hesitation upon the part of Congress in voting the necessary appropriations to free a great river like the Columbia from obstructions to navigation and open it to a free and untrammeled commerce?

A pointed illustration of the hardships imposed on the producers of Eastern Oregon and Eastern Washington Territory by the existing enormous transportation charges, and of the great necessity of a free river, is given in a recent issue of the Times-Mountaineer, a leading journal published at Dalles City, Wasco County, Oregon. It reads as follows:

The crops of Wasco County, between the Deschutes and John Day Rivers, have averaged the past season 30 bushels to the acre, and for the carriage of this to market the company has charged 15 cents a bushel; or, in other words, for every acre of wheat land the product of which has been exported it has received $4.50. Figuring on the 200,000 bushels of wheat shipped, the farmers of the portion of Wasco County mentioned above have paid $30,000 to this company to help make up the dividends to stockholders in New York, Boston, and other cities. It will thus appear that owning the railroad running through such a rich country is more remunerative than the proprietorship of the land. The farmer pays taxes, &c., incident to land ownership, and is at the expense of cultivating his land and harvesting his crop, while the railroad reaps the benefit and has only to send a locomotive to haul the loaded cars from the side track. If the season is favorable and the yield greater the company reaps the advantage as well as in the increase of acreage. In fact, the railroad has leased the lands to the occupants for an unlimited time, and charges $4.50 a year rental on every acre. Good lands can be purchased from the Government for $2.50 per acre, but if they are on the line of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company $4.50 an acre annually are charged by them.

But in discussing the question of the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia River at its mouth and throughout its length and with all its mighty tributaries we must not fail to remember the varied interests and productions and the vast undeveloped resources of the whole State and of the adjacent Territories, the rapid and complete development of which depends so largely on a free river. In addition to the 15,000,000 bushels of wheat produced in Oregon in 1885, of the value of nearly $10,000,000, she produced 5,798,000 bushels of oats during the same season of the value of $2,145,260; 164,000 bushels of corn, 1,239,084 bushels of barley, 22,260 bushels of rye, and 9,128 bushels of buckwheat. Her wool crop, which in 1870 was but 2,000,000 pounds and in 1874 but 4,000,000 pounds, had increased in 1884 to 12,000,000 pounds, and in 1885 to more than 15,000,000 pounds. The value of the clip in 1884 was $2,400,000 at an average market price of 20 cents per pound; while its value in 1885 was over $3,000,000. While the wheat exports from Oregon in 1870 were only 115,747 bushels of the value of but $119,139, they had risen in 1884 to 5,384,315 bushels of the value of $5,396,430.

THE SALMON FISHERIES OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

But passing down the Columbia and not stopping to discuss, or more than refer to the various manufacturing establishments that have within the past few years been established in the cities of Portland, Oregon City, Astoria, Salem, Roseburg, and along the Willamette, Umpqua, and Rogue Rivers, and in the great valleys of these names, or along the coast at Yaquina, Coos Bay, Port Orford, and on the Coquille River, we find extending from the great mouth of the Columbia for more than 50 miles inland, firmly established and gradually increasing in strength, importance, and value for the past twenty years one of the most interesting industries on the continent in the shape of the salmon fisheries.

These were established twenty years ago, in 1866. In that year the product was 4,000 cases, which at the then cash price of $16 a case made a total value of $64,000. Ten years later, in 1876, the catch was 450,000 cases, or an increase in that decade of nearly 11.250 per cent., and then worth $4.50 per case and of a total value of $2,025,000. Seven years later, in 1883, the product had increased to 630,000 cases of the value of $5 per case, making a total value for that year's catch of $3,150,000.

That we may comprehend better the magnitude of this great industry, it must be remembered that the average weight of each case, including the cans, is about 72 pounds, as the ordinary size can holds 1 pound, there being forty-eight cans in each case. So the catch of 1883, taking that year for an illustration, was about 22,680 tons of prepared salmon, or enough to load two hundred and twenty-six trains of cars of ten cars each, each car containing 10 tons of salmon, or twenty-three ship cargoes of 1,000 tons each.

In this industry over 50 canneries are in operation, over $2,000,000 of permanent capital is invested, over 1,700 boats, including 10 or 12 steam-tenders, are employed, and employment is given during each month of the fishing season to several thousand men. But in addition to the salmon fishing industry of the Columbia River, it is carried on with vigor and success on the Umpqua, the Rogue, and Coquille Rivers, at Tillamook and Coos Bays, Oregon, and also of course on the waters of Puget Sound.

OREGON AN EXPORTING STATE.

Oregon is largely an exporting State, and must in the near future become immensely so. Even now in her infancy, with her great resources comparatively undeveloped, she exports to foreign climes annually more than $40 for each man, woman, and child within her borders; and for every dollar's worth of goods she imports she exports products of her own soil and manufacture to the value of eight dollars and more. Her foreign commerce increased from a mere nothing in 1860 to $11,158,882 in 1882. There has been a slight falling off since, as there has been everywhere throughout the country, but not in so great a proportion as in most other places.

THE TONNAGE AND COMMERCE OF THE MOUTH OF THE COLUMBIA.

The tonnage of vessels entered and cleared in foreign trade alone at ports of Oregon in 1885 were: Entered—American, 10,466 tons; foreign, 40,963 tons. Cleared—American, 17,755 tons; foreign, 50,420 tons. Total, 68,175 tons.

The total tonnage over the bar at the mouth of the Columbia alone for the year ending September, 1885, as shown by custom-house statistics compiled by the Portland Board of Trade, was 869,943 tons. That being the tonnage with present sparse population, with on an average not more than one-tenth of our cultivable land of Oregon and Washington Territory and Idaho and Montana under cultivation, and with all the disadvantages of enormously high transportation rates, breaking of cargoes, reshipments, high insurance, pilot and lighterage charges, what must be the volume and value of the commerce that will flow out of the mouth of the Columbia when all these difficulties are overcome! No man can even approximate in an estimate. The records of no country on earth can furnish an example from which we may safely predict the magnitude of that commerce. Future history alone can reveal the proud story.

The importance of the present commerce of the Columbia River and the marvelous rapidity with which it is increasing may be seen by a comparison of the number of ships and value of cargoes of 1880 with those of 1884, only four years later. In 1880 only sixty-three vessels crossed the Columbia River bar for foreign and domestic ports, with cargoes valued at only $4,181,352; while in 1884 the number of vessels crossing for foreign and domestic ports was four hundred and three, with cargoes worth $15,000,000, an increase in the number of vessels in four years of over 600 per cent., and an increase in the value of cargoes of nearly 400 per cent.

THE LESSONS TAUGHT BY THE STATESMANSHIP OF OTHER NATIONS.

In these later days it has become customary with some men, statesmen and others, to denounce the river and harbor bill as a fraud, a legislative job, an unjustifiable and unconstitutional raid on the United States Treasury, and if a Senator or Member of the House can rise in his place and call the attention of the country to the fact that the Congress is about to pass a bill appropriating fifteen or eighteen millions of dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and accompanies the statement with words of denunciation, especially if he happen to represent a State not blessed with a river large enough to float a sawlog, he imagines his reputation as a champion of reform is forever established, that he has exposed to the country and world a gigantic fraud, and been the instrumentality of calling a halt in what he delights to characterize as little less than a downright swindle. It might perhaps be well for such men to enlarge the circle of their vision and the scope of their observation and learn knowledge from the policy and practices of other nations.

The governments of the Old World through statesmanlike and well-directed expenditures of public money in promoting and pushing forward at Government expense great internal improvements, especially in improving important natural water ways, and in constructing artificial canals, are rapidly bringing the products of the field in those countries, and especially cereal producing fields, into close proximity with the great centers of population and consumption in the European world; and thus it is that competitors for the wheat markets of the world are coming to the front with alarming rapidity in Russia, Germany, India, Australia, Africa, and Western Asia, and other portions of the countries beyond the seas; and as a result our producers are driven from European markets, and hence in a great measure the present alarming depression in the price of cereals in this country. Not for twenty-four years has the price of wheat been so low in Chicago as it was the past month, 73⅛ cents per bushel, although by reason of the drought in certain sections and the manipulation of stock-jobbers there is something of a boom just now. Germany, looking to the interests of her producers in the remote interior of her vast regions, has connected by ship-canal Lubeck Bay on the Baltic with Heligoland Bay on the North Sea, spanning the Holstein peninsula, thus connecting the waters of the North Sea and the Baltic, saving over 400 miles of difficult and dangerous transportation via the tortuous water route separating Denmark from Sweden and Norway and reducing the cost of transporting wheat from the interior of Germany to the waters of the Atlantic from 6 to 7 cents a bushel; and in addition to all this Germany has recently determined on a grand system of improvements of her rivers and harbors at an estimated cost of over $125,000,000.

Why, Germany has expended over $20,000,000 in the recent past, $2,000,000 more than the entire amount proposed to be appropriated by the pending bill, in the improvement of one small river in her territory, and still it is only navigable by cable towage, and a chain cable of over 100 miles in length has been established and freight is carried on regular schedules by means of cable towage on this river for this distance at less than 5 mills per ton per mile, and this for short as well as long hauls. Germany has constructed over 1,500 miles of canals, on some eighty-two different routes.

France, too, although just arisen from a weary bed of national affliction, occasioned by disastrous war, sapped of her substance to the extent of a hundred million money indemnity as the price of her failure in that war, weighed down with a debt of over $4,750,000,000, and with over 3,000 miles of constructed canals, and 5,000 miles of navigable rivers, the cost of constructing and improving of which was $231,475,867, has recently estimated for and proposes to expend in the near future in internal improvements and for the following purposes the following amounts:

For the improvement of her harbors	$13,200,000
For canals	142,600,000
For harbors	20,000,000
Making a sum total of	175,800,000

As was stated in a recent paper by Major King, of the United States Engineer Corps:

A sum larger than all that has been expended for rivers and harbors by the United States since the foundation of the Government.

The sum total of the amount expended by the United States since the foundation of the Government (including all unexpended balances), as stated by Major King, and as appears from the statistics, amounts to only $136,112,576. To this add the sum of $31,021,423, which is the aggregate so far as can be ascertained of all that has been expended by the several States and Territories and by private corporations since the foundation of our Government for river improvements, you have only $167,134,000, or, as stated by Major King, $8,000,000 less than this one proposed appropriation of the French Republic.

Russia, too, is marching forward in the great work of internal improvements, by the improvement of her natural water ways and the construction of ship and steamboat canals. Already she has built a ship-canal to connect the waters of the Volga and the Caspian Sea with the Casperian system of railways, and now she is improving the many mouthed Volga from its mouths on the Caspian Sea, a distance of 150 miles into the interior, to a pass in the mountains; and here again by the construction of a ship-canal of 50 miles in length she proposes to connect the waters of the rivers Volga and Don, thus connecting by ship-canal the waters of the Caspian and Mediterranean Seas via the waters of the Sea of Asov, the Bosphorus, and Black Sea.

What a grand conception! Surely reform statesmen and unprogressive statesmen who stand with bated breath in the presence of and start with holy horror at a bill that proposes to appropriate $18,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors in this grand country of 3,501,409 square miles and of sixty million people must be scarce in Russia, otherwise these grand internal improvements by which great seas are connected by artificial canals and the producers of the interior brought in easy communication with seaports would never have been inaugurated or pushed forward to completion. But they do go on, and we are told that when completed, as they will be at no distant day, the cost of transportation of wheat from the fertile plains of the Caspian and along the Volga to the Atlantic and Mediterranean ports will be reduced at least to the extent of 8 to 10 cents per bushel. In internal improvements of this character Russia has constructed over 900 miles of canals.

What, for instance, has been the result of the construction of the great Suez Canal in stimulating the production of wheat in the Indian Empire? Prior to the opening of that canal, India produced but a few meager millions of breadstuffs, and exported to Europe annually considerably less than half a million bushels of wheat. Now she produces 287,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, or considerably more than one-half the largest crop ever produced in the United States (about 500,000,000), and while the Hindoos exported to Great Britain but 1,600,000 bushels in 1879, in 1883 they exported to that country 21,000,000, their total exports then being 40,000,000 bushels, while the past year, according to the most reliable reports, India sent to European markets, to compete with American products and reduce their price, about 75,000,000 bushels of wheat; and notwithstanding this marvelous development in the wheat culture of India, Great Britain, looking forward to still greater development, is contemplating expending $100,000,000 in internal improvements in the construction of railroads and canals in the Indian Empire; although the British Government has already constructed in England and Wales 2,910 miles of canals at a cost of about $100,000,000, and has a river transportation on which untold millions have been expended of over 1,400 miles.

Holland, too, furnishes evidence of statesmanship in this respect. The North Holland Canal, completed about sixty years ago, at a cost of nearly $5,000,000, being 52 miles in length and over 16 feet deep, is a monument to the statesmanship of the Germans of that day who conceived and constructed it.

THE PEOPLE'S INTERESTS LIE IN THE DIRECTION OF CAPACIOUS HARBORS AND FREE RIVERS.

It is clearly evident the producers and shippers and consumers of this country, if they would guard their own interests and protect themselves against the rapacity of formidable combinations of aggregated capital, must look to the improvement of the great natural water ways of the country and the construction of artificial ship and steamboat canals and ship railways for relief from exorbitant transportation charges.

A free water way to the boats of all comers is of itself not only the cheapest and best means, although not quite so rapid as by rail, for the transportation of heavy freight, but is also an absolute check upon the grasping tendencies of railway corporations.

It has been demonstrated beyond all question by the history of the past and by the practices of the present that railways can not and do not compete in the carrying of heavy freight with free and untrammeled water ways, natural or artificial. Take for illustration the New York Central, with all the grand facilities it affords with a four-track railroad, and compare it and its transportation business with the parallel line of water transportation composed in parts of the Erie Canal and Hudson River, and what do we find, even before the tolls were taken off the canal?

According to the report of the New York State engineer, the average actual cost of transporting freight (wheat) on the New York Central is fifty-four hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, not counting anything for interest on capital invested, and the average charge on that road is eighty-eight hundredths of a cent per ton per mile; whereas the transportation charges on wheat from Buffalo to New York via the Erie Canal and Hudson River is but twenty-one hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or thirty-three hundredths of a cent per ton per mile less than it costs the New York Central to transport it; and this according to the report of the State engineer appointed under the railway laws of the State of New York; and hence we find the railway charges eighty-eight hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or sixty-seven hundredths of a cent per ton per mile more than is charged on the water-transportation route. And were the Erie Canal and Hudson River wiped out of existence to-day, how long, in the judgment of any reasonable man, would the present transportation rates on the New York Central remain as low as they are? The conceded profit of to-day of thirty-four hundredths of a cent per ton per mile would in all probability be increased to five times that amount, or perhaps much more, especially as the parallel line to Buffalo of the West Shore road is now controlled by the New York Central.

But as it is now the canal and river, as might be reasonably expected, do the great bulk of the business and the people get the benefit of the competition.

The statistics show that during the past year the Erie Canal was the conduit through which 37,500,000 bushels of wheat were delivered at the port of New York, while the sum total that came through the almost countless railroad lines that center there, including the four-track New York Central, was only about 28,000,000 bushels, or 4,750,000 bushels less than one-half of the whole amount, while the total amount of tonnage (in bushels) of flour, corn-meal, wheat, corn, oats, barley, pease, and malt which arrived in New York from the 1st day of January, 1883, to the 31st day of December, 1883, was 124,336,237 bushels, and was delivered at that port by the following routes:

	Bushels.
New York Central and Hudson River Railroad	32,125,615
New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad	28,765,288
Pennsylvania Central Railroad	13,060,494
Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad	4,581,770
Various routes	856,924
By river and coast	3,725,238
By canal (seven months)	41,220,908
	124,336,237

Of the entire amount of grain thus received at the port of New York during the year it will be observed that—

	Per cent.
The New York Central Railroad carried	25.84
The Erie Railway carried	23.13
The Pennsylvania Central Railroad carried	10.50
The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad carried	3.69
Various small routes carried	0.69
River and coast	3
The Erie Canal in seven months carried	33.15

Numerous other instances might be cited to the same effect did time justify. For instance, the railroad commissioners of the State of Illinois the past year fixed the maximum rates on wheat in car-load lots for 130 miles 7.21 cents per bushel, while the charges for the same distance for wheat from Henry to Chicago by the Illinois and Michigan Canal, including the State tolls, is but 3 cents per bushel, or 1.21 cents per bushel less than onehalf the charge by rail.

In our recent history we have a monumental and most commendable example of the manner in which internal and external commerce may be promoted by the improvement of important lines of water ways. Where did New Orleans stand even twelve years ago as a seaport and in respect of its relations to foreign commerce? Since the completion of the Eads jetties what has she in these respects become? In 1883, as shown by the statistics, she was the second port in the United States in the value of her exports (New York of course being first), and ranked, I believe, third in total foreign commerce.

THE PRODUCER NOT INTERESTED IN PROMOTING THE WELFARE OF ANY PARTICULAR CITY OR PORT TO THE DETRIMENT OF OTHERS.

To the present limited and easily enumerated thousands now settled in the inland empire, and the great plain of the Columbia in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, or to the almost countless millions that will, ere another generation shall have passed away, find happy, prosperous homes in that extensive and fertile region, it matters but little whether it is Portland or Astoria, Vancouver, Kalama, Yaquina, Tacoma, or Seattle, or some other point on Puget Sound, or the Columbia River, or the Pacific Ocean, that is to be the dumping ground or point of transshipment from land to sea, for the untold millions of tons of cereals and other products that must in the future from year to year as the years roll on, find their way from this prolific field to the waiting and beckoning markets of the world. With them this is not such a material question, however important it may be to the different rival ports contesting for the golden treasures that must inevitably result to the one which is finally most successful in the grand and honorable competitive race for the control of the trade of an empire.

To the producers and shippers the great all-absorbing question is: By what means shall they at the lowest possible cost and with the least possible discrimination, secure easy, safe and rapid transportation of their products free from transhipment or change of bulk or unnecessary inland or maritime exactions to the seaboard, or head of ship navigation? And as the cost of transportation can only be reduced to its proper minimum and a just and reasonable rate, so as to result alike fairly to the producer and transporter by the absolute destruction of the power of monopoly, and as it is the duty of Congress to legislate for the good of the many and not in the interest of any particular city, or port, or company, or corporation, to the detriment of the true interests of the whole people, it must be apparent to all familiar with the situation in the Pacific Northwest, that there are at least three great national enterprises in connection with the matter of transportation in that section of the country (and I am not now speaking of the interests of Southern Oregon, or of the immense importance to that section of the country of the improvements at Coos Bay, Coquille River, Port Orford, and Umpqua, and a part of which is liberally provided for in this bill and in reference to which I shall speak specially hereafter) that should be regarded with unreserved favor by the Congress of the United States.

First, and infinitely more important than either of the other two, is the removing of all obstructions to navigation from, and the opening up to free and successful navigation of the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries, so that boats of large draught and heavy river tonnage, starting from points in the distant interior of this great producing field, may, laden with the wheat, and wool, and stock, and other products of the valley, move on without interruption until they meet the ships from every ocean that will receive and bear their cargoes onward to the various markets of the world; and also, of course, such permanent improvements at the great mouth of the Columbia, in accordance with the carefully prepared plans of the United States Engineer Department, as will forever remove all existing impediments dangerous to or restrictive of ship navigation at this grand gateway of the commerce of the world, and make it an entirely easy, safe, and inviting entrance for ships of largest draught and heaviest tonnage from every port and sea on the civilized globe.

Second. The speedy completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad across the Cascade Mountains to Tacoma, on Puget Sound, thus perfecting a great rival transcontinental line from Saint Paul to Portland, Oreg., via the waters of Puget Sound.

Third. The completion of the permanent improvement, now far under way under the direction of the General Government, of Yaquina Harbor, on the Pacific Ocean, in accordance with the plans of the United States Engineer Department, so as to admit to that competing port the ships of commerce of large draught; and the speedy completion of the Oregon Pacific Railroad, now completed and in successful operation a distance of 72 miles eastward from Yaquina into the very heart of the great wheat-producing fields of the Willamette Valley, so as to cross that valley entire and the Cascade range of mountains to the eastward, and penetrate the great grazing and wheat-producing region of Eastern Oregon, Idaho, and Washington, connecting with other already completed lines from the East. With these three national enterprises completed, and they all will be in the near future, for they are each and all demanded by the commercial and political necessities of the times, and with the lands of the Northern Pacific from Wallula to Portland freed from the grasp of that corporation and thrown open to settlement, then, and not till then, will the shackles of commercial tyranny and the manacles of transportation monopoly fall from the necks and hands and hearts of the producers of the inland empire.

The completion of the improvements at the mouth of the Columbia, at the Cascades, and other points below The Dalles of the Columbia on the Columbia and Willamette Rivers, and above The Dalles on the Columbia and its tributaries, and at Yaquina Harbor, with the completion of the Northern Pacific to Puget Sound, the Oregon Pacific across the great wheat-growing belt of the Willamette, and into Eastern Oregon, with the completion of the gap on the line of the Oregon and California, will of themselves, even though the proposed improvements at The Dalles should meet with some delay, reduce the cost of transportation of every bushel of grain and every pound of wool, or other product the people of Oregon may have to export, to at least one-sixth of the present rates, and will to that extent add to the personal interest of the producer, and promote the general welfare and material prosperity of the whole State.

But for one, I am unwilling, when another session of Congress shall convene, to hesitate longer in urging upon Congress to the extent of my power, in connection with my colleagues in the Senate and House, the importance and pressing necessity of inaugurating without delay work on some suitable and proper plan; and at present I am strongly inclined to the plan of a steamboat railway as recommended by Maj. W. A. Jones, of the Engineer Corps, for the purpose of overcoming the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia.

The commencement of this great work, or of some suitable or proper enterprise to overcome obstructions to navigation at that point, can not, in justice to the people of the Pacific Northwest, or of the whole nation, be longer delayed. And as chairman of a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, having that matter under investigation, under instruction from the Senate, I hope to be able early in the next session of Congress to report a plan for this great work that may commend itself to the people most interested, and that may receive the favor of Congress.

These great works at the mouth of the Columbia, the Cascades, The Dalles, and Yaquina are not local but national, and indeed international in their character, as much so as is the improvement of the Mississippi River, the construction of the Hennepin Canal, or the improvement of New York Harbor, and all these I concede are in every sense great national enterprises of paramount importance to the producers and shippers of this country, and to the best interests of the Republic.

In conclusion I may be permitted to say that with the completion of the commercial improvements now under way in Southern Oregon, at Coos Bay, for which $45,000 is provided in this bill, the Coquille River, for which $20,000 is inserted, and others yet to be inaugurated at Port Orford, Umpqua, and other important points; with the completion of the small gap to complete railroad connection between Oregon and California; and the proposed improvement, for which a bill is pending in the Senate, for shortening the route and reducing the grade of the military wagon-road between the Rogue River and Klamath countries, and the construction of branch and intersecting lines of railroad into Southeastern Oregon; with Government recognition of Crater Lake Park, the grandest natural park on the face of the earth—we except none; with fraudulent wagon-road grants wiped out of existence by judicial decrees; we may expect the people of that State, in all its sections and in every locality, whose vital interests it is my bounden duty as well as my great pleasure to aid in advancing and promoting here, to throw off the fetters of commercial bondage that have so materially impeded their progress in the past, brush aside the cloud of isolation peculiar to all pioneer countries, and which through all these years has measurably enshrouded them in its discouraging mists, and darkened and obscured the path of their progress; to assert their independence of and declare their triumph over every impediment that has heretofore delayed and obstructed them in their patient, honest, persistent, and noble efforts to establish on the shores of the Pacific a great empire of civilization, an independent and powerful State, which shall acknowledge no master, no dictator, or recognize no superior in all that pertains to social, commercial, and political equality, independence, and power, save that grand entity—the National Government, the union of States, the American Republic—of which it is to day no inconsiderable factor, and of which in the no distant future it is destined to become so an exceptionally important and highly influential a constituent part.

These things accomplished, then will the ever-increasing beauty and grandeur of the star of that empire of civilization, of political and commercial power, which but in the recent past, as so beautifully described by Berkeley, took its course to the westward through the fogs and deserts, and repellent savagery of the "intervening wastes," and over the "rock-ribbed" and rugged mountains, and the dense and forbidding wildernesses of the far West, shine with a new brilliancy, and a more fixed and steady light, and with an undimmed and inextinguishable glory.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There are so many members of the Senate absent and all seem very much inclined to stop for the day that I shall not ask them to remain longer. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment? The Chair desires to lay before the Senate sundry House bills.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Very well.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2124) amendatory of and supplementary to "an act to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes," approved May 26, 1824, and providing an additional place for holding the several courts thereof; and

A bill (H. R. 2539) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange property purchased at Abingdon, Va., as a site for a public building for more suitable property.

GREELY'S POLAR EXPEDITION REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution for "printing the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, by First Lieut. E. BARKSDALE,

The bill (H. R. 8950) to remove the political disabilities of Francis Sorrell, of Roanoke County, Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 2124) amendatory of and supplementary to "an act to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes," approved May 26, 1824, and providing an additional place for holding the several courts thereof, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 2539) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange property purchased at Abingdon, Va., as a site for a public building for more suitable property was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MICHAEL FITZPATRICK.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill (S. 2803) granting a pension to Michael Fitzpatrick has been reported from the Senate Committee on Pensions. A similar bill comes to us from the House to-day. I move that the House bill be put on its passage and the Senate bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, we can not pass a House bill now. It can be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill will be placed on the Calendar instead of being referred to the Committee on Pensions under the previous order of reference.

ABBY L. BURBANK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2192) granting a pension to Abby L. Burbank, which was, in lines 7 and 8, to strike out "forty" and to insert "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abby L. Burbank, widow of Charles H. Burbank, late a surgeon in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. SARAH YOUNG.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2113) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Young, which was, in lines 4 and 5, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $12 per month, the name of Mrs. Sarah Young, of Des Moines, Iowa, for and on account of services rendered as a nurse during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to non-concur in that amendment, and to ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the presiding officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, were appointed.

EDWARD CORNING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1666) granting a pension to Edward Corning, which was, in line 8, to strike out the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month" and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. EDMUNDS. How will it read then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Corning, late a lieutenant in the Eighty-fifth New York Volunteers, and afterward commissioned captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. SAWYER. The words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" occur twice. I move to concur in the amendment of the House, which strikes out the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month," and to non-concur in the amendment of the House inserting the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. EDMUNDS. How will the bill read with the amendment as amended?

The Chief Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Corning, late a lieutenant in the Eighty-fifth New York Volunteers and afterward commissioned captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand that yet. I would like to know what rate of pension this gentleman is going to get.

Mr. BLAIR. That will depend on the result of an examination.

Mr. SAWYER. He was a captain, and he will get at the rate of $20 per month. I have no objection to a committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that read once more. I certainly can not understand what it means just now.

The bill as proposed to be amended was again read.

The amendment of the House to strike out the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of twenty dollars a month" was concurred in.

The amendment of the House to insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" was non-concurred in.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. CHACE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw his motion to adjourn, and let us have an executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is quite impossible. You can not do any executive business to-night. If we do anything more let us go on with the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate adjourn. The question is on that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending that motion I move that the Senate do now adjourn, with the consent of the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], pending the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, moves that the Senate adjourn. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on political qnestions; but I desire to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Now I ask for a vote on the canal amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I supposed Senators were so fatigued that they wanted to go home.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 13.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll. The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 10, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BULLOCK, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DANIEL H. ROSS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 524, entitled "An act granting a pension to Daniel H. Ross." An application was filed in the Pension Bureau by the beneficiary named in this bill, and considerable testimony was filed in support of the same. I do not understand that the claim has been finally rejected. But, however that may be, the claimant died, as I am advised, on the 1st day of February last. This, of course, renders the proposed legislation entirely inoperative, if it would not actually prejudice the claim of his surviving widow. She has already been advised of the evidence necessary to complete the claim of her husband, and it is not at all improbable that she will be able to prosecute the same to a successful issue for her benefit. At any rate her rights should not be in the least jeopardized by the completion of the legislation proposed in this bill.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 9, 1886.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the message and accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for your information a report from the Secretary of State, inclosing the correspondence which has been exchanged between the Department of State and the Governments of Switzerland and Italy on the subject of international copyright.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 9, 1886.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the property purchased as a site for the public building authorized to be erected at Abingdon, Va., by the act approved July 11, 1882, for other property more suitable for the purpose: Provided, That such other suitable property can be obtained without any additional cost to the United States.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TRIGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCRANTON. I ask that House bill No. 2124 be taken from the House Calendar and passed with amendments.

Mr. BURNES. I am compelled to demand the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not object to the consideration of this bill. One bill has been passed on the other side, and this side should be accorded the same courtesy.

Mr. SCRANTON. The bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURNES. I withdraw the call for the regular order.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2124) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes," approved May 26, 1824, and providing an additional place for holding the several courts thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe, and Carbon, in the State of Pennsylvania, shall cease to be a part of the eastern judicial district of Pennsylvania, and shall be added to and form a part of the western judicial district of said State; and that, besides the terms of the circuit and district courts of said western district now directed by law to be held in said western district, there shall be held two terms of each of said courts in every year at Scranton, in the county of Lackawanna, which shall commence the first Mondays of the months of March and September in each and every year, beginning in September next, and be continued and adjourned from time to time as the courts may deem expedient for the transaction of the business thereof.

SEC. 2. That all suits which shall be brought against persons residing in the counties of Lackawanna, Wayne, Pike, Monroe, Carbon, Susquehanna, Wyoming, Luzerne, Bradford, and Columbia shall be determined at the sessions of the courts herein provided to be held at Scranton; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit or confine the business of said terms to said counties, nor shall the status of any actions pending or liens now in existence in the eastern judicial district, and pertaining to the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe, and Carbon, be interfered with, but shall continue in like manner as though this act had not passed.

SEC. 3. That the clerk of the district and circuit courts for the western judicial district of Pennsylvania, and marshal and district attorney for said district, shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts; and said clerk and marshal shall appoint deputies who shall reside and keep their offices at Scranton, Pa. Said deputies shall keep in their offices such records as appertain to their offices, and said deputy clerk shall keep in his office full records of all actions, proceedings, and judgments in said courts.

SEC. 4. That the marshal of said western judicial district shall for the time being provide a suitable place at the city of Scranton for holding the several courts and for keeping the records thereof.

SEC. 5. That as compensation for the increased labor and expense imposed on him by the passage of this law the United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania shall be paid annually, by the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of $1,000 in addition to the yearly salary now or hereafter allowed him by law.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

In line 3, section 1, strike out the words "Monroe and Carbon;"
In lines 9 and 10 of section 2 strike out the words "Monroe and Carbon."
Strike out section 5, as follows:
"SEC. 5. That as compensation for the increased labor and expense imposed on him by the passage of this law the United States district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania shall be paid annually, by the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of $1,000 in addition to the yearly salary now or hereafter allowed him by law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that the bill is to be passed with the amendments?

The SPEAKER. That is the request of the gentleman in charge of it.

Mr. STORM. I wish to inquire whether the counties of Pike and Wayne are struck out?

Mr. SCRANTON. I am about to offer an amendment which will meet the views of the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand, the bill as amended will leave the districts exactly as now constituted.

Mr. SCRANTON. With the amendments there will be no change in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments sent to the desk by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCRANTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of section 1 the following:
"That the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe, and Carbon, in the State of Pennsylvania, shall cease to be a part of the eastern judicial district of Pennsylvania, and shall be added to and form a part of the western judicial district of said State, and."

Mr. BAYNE. That leaves the district just as it is.

Mr. RANDALL. And the bill does not increase the judge's salary?

Mr. SCRANTON. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the remaining amendments sent up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in the eighth line of section 1, the words "said western district," and insert in lieu thereof "the western judicial district of Pennsylvania."
Strike out, in the second and third lines of section 2, the words "Wayne, Pike, Monroe, Carbon."
Strike out all of section 2 after the word "counties," in line 7; the words stricken out being as follows:
"Nor shall the status of any actions pending or liens now in existence in the eastern judicial district, and pertaining to the counties of Wayne, Pike, Monroe, and Carbon, be interfered with, but shall continue in like manner as though this act had not passed."

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the amendments embrace the striking out of the increased salary?

The SPEAKER. That is a part of the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. PARKER. The provision for increased salary has been stricken out by the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection these amendments will all be considered as adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SCRANTON. The western judicial district of Pennsylvania is the largest in population by the census of 1880 in the United States with the exception of two—the northern of Ohio and the northern of New York, both of which are agricultural districts. Its present limits were fixed in 1824, sixty-two years ago, during which period new counties have been organized in the eastern and western portions and have rapidly become settled and large business interests have been developed.

The United States courts should be made accessible to the people and convenient to them. Upon this principle are based the merits of this bill. It should require no argument to convince you that the great empire of interior Pennsylvania demands more Federal court facilities than it did sixty-two years ago. The total population of the western judicial district of the State in 1820 was but 321,481, while the counties included in this bill and comprising the greater part of the anthracite coal region have to-day a population of over 400,000, one-tenth of that of the whole State. Should not the convenience of the people in this populous corner of the State be considered and respected?

That their convenience will be greatly promoted by the passage of this bill is demonstrated by a mere inspection of the map of Pennsylvania.

First. Negatively. It is evident that no city in the State could be selected for our seat of Federal justice less convenient than Pittsburgh. The distance is nearly 400 miles, the entire width of the State, while the lines of travel are not direct, but involve frequent changes and tedious delays.

Second. Positively. Scranton is the natural and commercial center of the territory covered by the bill, not more than 60 miles from its farthest confines, and connected with every important point by direct railroad lines.

The vastly superior convenience of Scranton over Pittsburgh being demonstrated, two considerations remain to be considered on this point: First. Are the population and business interests of this territory sufficiently large to justify the measure? Second. Does the actual amount of the United States court business from this territory justify it?

First. The population of the counties embraced in the bill was, according to the tenth census, 369,236, nearly one-eleventh of that of the whole State. It is now certainly more than 400,000. As the population of this part of the State has for many years been increasing more rapidly than that of the rest of the State, it is safe to infer that it now contains a considerably larger proportion of the State's population than in 1880. Further, the population here is very much concentrated. Within the counties named are Scranton (70,000), Wilkes Barre (32,000), and many cities and towns of from 3,000 to 10,000. The business interests of the region are very vast, including as it does nearly the whole of the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania. Here are carried on all the mining and shipping operations of the following great corporations: Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, Pennsylvania Coal Company, Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, and a large part of those of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Reading Railroad Company, Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, in addition to those of almost numberless smaller corporations. The manufacture of iron and steel is a large and important industry, and other manufactures are numerously established and rapidly increasing.

Second. Of the criminal indictments found in the United States courts of the western district about 30 per cent. come from the six counties embraced in this bill. Of criminal informations a much larger percentage would be found but for the fact that, owing to the distance from the court, a much larger percentage of cases commenced in this part of the district are settled than in the western part.

During the last year of the operation of the bankruptcy act (1877–1878) from 20 to 25 per cent. of that class of cases originating in the western district came from these six counties. Should the bill be enacted, a still larger percentage would be found here.

Of the ordinary civil business of the courts a very small percentage is now brought from this territory, which is, it seems to us, a very strong argument in favor of the bill; for the reason of the small quantity of civil business is that very inconvenience of the courts which the bill is intended to correct. Crimes against the United States and bankruptcy cases must be prosecuted in the United States courts, they having exclusive jurisdiction thereof. But of ordinary civil causes of action, of which the United States courts have jurisdiction, the State courts also have concurrent jurisdiction. Therefore in most cases the advantages which would be found in the selection of the United States forum are far outweighed by the inconvenience of suing in a court 400 miles away. So that the small amount of civil business originating in these counties is another proof of the fact upon which we base our claim for relief; namely, that the present arrangement of the district amounts to a practical exclusion of a large body of the people from the advantages of the United States courts.

The fact that the wisdom of Congress once established the districts as now divided weighs nothing against our argument, for the conditions have completely changed since that division was made. In 1824, when the present districts were formed, the use of anthracite coal for fuel was as completely unknown as the use of electricity, so that the whole industry in which the activities of this section live, move, and have their being was as yet unborn. At that time the counties of Luzerne and Lackawanna contained one-fiftieth of the population of the State; in 1880 they contained one-nineteenth.

If we have established the fact that the convenience of the people would be greatly promoted by the proposed change, the only remaining question is will the interests of the Government be in any way prejudiced by it? In only two ways can we conceive that the two interests could conflict: First, by the multiplication of offices; second, by increased expense.

First. As to multiplication of offices, the bill is certainly very harmless. It provides for but two court officers to reside in the territory, to wit, a deputy marshal and a deputy clerk. The former is not a new officer, for there is now, and for many years has been, a deputy marshal residing either at Scranton or Wilkes Barre. The deputy clerk is, indeed, a new officer, but a very insignificant one, and one that is paid by fees and receives no salary from the Government.

Second. As to expense, we hold that the proposed change will result in a certain saving of expense to the Government. It is shown by the Attorney-General's report for 1885 (pages 79 and 81) that the business of the courts of the eastern district of Pennsylvania for that year was about double that of the western district, and that the expense to the Government was proportionally larger from all items except "jurors" and "witnesses."

Under these two heads the Government paid out in 1885 in the western district more than twice as much as in the eastern district. The reason is obvious. The western district is so large, and so large a body of its population lives on its very confines within the territory embraced in this bill, that the mileage fees of witnesses and jurors are very large. While the per diem pay of a juror or witness attending court at Pittsburgh for a week from Luzerne or Lackawanna County is from $12 to $15, his mileage is from $50 to $75. Nearly the whole of this mileage would be saved to the Government if the court was held in Scranton. As there were nearly two hundred jurors and Government witnesses at the Pittsburgh courts in 1884 and 1885 from counties named in the bill, it will be seen that a great saving would have been effected by holding the courts at Scranton. If the saving is placed at $25 per capita, a very moderate estimate, it would have reached in these two years the sum of $5,000. In addition to this expense there is to be taken into account the large mileage fees of the marshal in the transportation of prisoners, &c. We cite one or two cases by way of illustration and contrast:

Marshal's bill, United States vs. Chris. Carlson (Luzerne County)	$188 10
Marshal's bill, United States vs. John Burger (Lackawanna County)	105 00
Marshal's bill, United States vs. J. R. Rumbaugh (Pittsburgh)	5 40
Marshal's bill, United States vs. F. Brannon (Pittsburgh)	2 50

Altogether it seems safe to predict that, so far from the holding of courts as proposed becoming a source of increased expense to the Government, it will prove a measure of economy so important as of itself to justify the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCRANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH LUCE.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the message of the President vetoing the bill (H. R. 5997) granting a pension to Elizabeth Luce.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that this report be printed in the RECORD and laid over for subsequent consideration.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report will be printed in the RECORD and laid over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report to accompany bill H. R. 5997 and Executive Document 281:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States vetoing House bill No. 5997, granting a pension to Elizabeth Luce, have considered the same, and report:

The objections of the President are set forth in the following message:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5997, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elizabeth Luce."

The claimant named in this bill is the widow of John W. Luce, who entered the Army in August, 1861, and who was discharged in January, 1864, for a disability declared at the time in the surgeon's certificate to arise from "organic stricture of the urethra," which, from his statement, existed at the time of his enlistment.

Notwithstanding the admission which thus appears to have been made by him at the time of his discharge, he soon afterward made an application for a pension, alleging that his difficulty arose from his being thrown forward on the pommel of his saddle when in the service.

Upon an examination of this claim by a special examiner it is stated that no one could be found who had any knowledge of such an injury, and the claim was rejected.

In 1883, twenty years after the soldier alleged he was injured in the manner stated, he died, and the cause of his death was declared to be "chronic gastritis, complicated with kidney difficulty."

It is alleged that the examinations made by the Pension Bureau developed the fact that the deceased soldier was a man of quite intemperate habits.

The theory upon which this widow should be pensioned can only be that the death of her husband resulted from a disability or injury contracted or received in the military service. It seems to me that however satisfactorily the injury which he described may be established, and though every suspicion as to his habits be dismissed, there can hardly possibly be any connection between such an injury and the causes to which his death is attributed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

[H. R. 5997. Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act granting a pension to Elizabeth Luce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Luce, widow of John W. Luce, late a private in Company E, of the First Ohio Light Artillery.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The proofs on file in the Pension Office in this case have been very carefully re-examined, and the committee are still of the opinion that this widow should be pensioned.

The following is a copy of the former report made by this committee:

"[House Report No. 1100, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"That Elizabeth Luce is the widow of John W. Luce, deceased, late a private of Company E, First Ohio Light Artillery, who died at Grand Junction, Iowa, November 17, 1883. Cause of death, as reported by Dr. J. D. Kirby, the attending physician, 'gastritis, chronic; relapse, complications; general debility; kidney difficulty.'

"At the time of his death said John W. Luce had on file an undetermined application for pension for an alleged stricture of the urethra caused by being thrown upon the pommel of his saddle about August 15, 1863, while in the service. The widow continued to prosecute the claim, which was finally rejected January 7, 1885, on the ground that 'alleged stricture of the urethra was not due to soldier's military service.' The papers in this case from the Pension Office, which are very voluminous, have been very carefully examined, and the only possible ground for the conclusion arrived at by the Pension Office is to be found in the following statement made by the surgeon in soldier's certificate of discharge, namely: 'Organic stricture of the urethra, which, from his statement, existed at the time of enrollment.

"Luce explains in a letter that he made this statement at the time to prevent his transfer to the Invalid Corps. They had administered chloroform, and he was still upon the operating table. That he was free from the disability before and at the time of his enlistment is proven by many affidavits of neighbors and friends, among which James Brown, of Berea, Ohio, testifies that he became acquainted with claimant in 1857, who then worked for his brother, John Brown, manufacturing grindstones, and he worked with him nearly all the time for three years prior to his enlistment, and knew him to be a sound, able-bodied man, commanding the best wages for his labor.

"Dr. A. S. Allen, of Berea, Ohio, testifies that he attended claimant's family, and met him often while he was engaged in work about the quarries prior to his enlistment, and he has no knowledge of his ever being sick or in any way disabled during that time; he believes he should have known if he had been unsound. After his discharge, in 1864, he (Luce) applied to him for aid for some urinary trouble, he thinks inability to pass urine, and he was troubled thereby until he moved away in 1866.

"Andrew Berwick, lieutenant of Company E, First Ohio Light Artillery, testifies that when claimant entered the service he was a sound, healthy man, and so continued until August 15, 1863, when at Battle Creek, Tenn., he was injured in his urinary organs by the ring on the pommel of his saddle while he was driving one of the teams attached to a gun of his battery. This is further proven by affidavits of comrades; and the continuance of disability to date of death is proven by abundant and credible testimony.

"Dr. G. Low testified April 22, 1867, that he examined claimant and found him suffering from enlarged prostate gland and stricture, irremediable except through surgical operation, which would endanger his life, and would not be advisable except as a last resort.

"While the diagnosis of death-cause by the physician who attended him in his last illness does not name stricture of urethra as the cause of death, yet it is a reasonable presumption that it contributed largely to produce the general debility, kidney, and other troubles which did culminate in death.

"Your committee are of the opinion that the soldier's death is clearly traceable to the disability received in the service, and believe his widow should be pensioned; therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The President withholds his approval on the ground that "there can hardly possibly be any connection between the injury alleged and the cause to which his death is attributed." The attendant physician at time of soldier's death gave mortuary certificate as follows:

"Cause of death, gastritis, chronic; relapse, complications, general debility, kidney difficulty."

And in testimony before a special examiner, he says that while gastritis was the immediate cause of his death, the complications helped it along; that he was greatly debilitated, generally run down, and that his urinary troubles contributed to the general debility of his system.

There are on file in this case the results of four official medical examinations. All find the man disabled from some serious urinary trouble, but no two of them give the same diagnosis or agree as to the cause of the trouble.

The proof is conclusive that some trouble of the kidneys, bladder, prostate gland, or urethra disabled him during all the time from his discharge to death.

His wife swears that he died of the disability with which he had been continuously afflicted, and the attending physician says he died of gastritis, general debility, and kidney troubles.

It does not seem, therefore, a violent presumption to presume that the various urinary troubles which existed and disabled him for twenty years, although at time of discharge called only "stricture of the urethra," were the direct, if not the immediate, cause of his death.

The President makes prominent in his veto message the result of a special examination, which was that no one could be found who had any knowledge of such an injury, and that the soldier was intemperate.

To those who have had occasion to carefully scrutinize many of the reports of these ex parte special examinations, it seems quite apparent that they are often made with a determination to defeat a claim if possible. But in this case the work is overdone. So very much is proven that the testimony is valueless. The examiner says, as a result of this examination, "I fail to find that claimant was troubled with stricture or other urinary disease prior to enlistment," and his witnesses testify that soldier had no such trouble at any time during service, yet the lieutenant commanding the company swears to the disability. The hospital records prove it; he is discharged on account of it, and his claim for pension was rejected because it existed prior to enlistment.

It is these same witnesses of this special examiner that suggest the intemperance. But since the records show that they are absolutely incorrect and unreliable as to the other matter testified to, their testimony can not and should not be taken as of any force or value to prove intemperance, and should not prejudice this case.

John W. Luce served two years before he was disabled. Proof of disability and discharge for same is conclusive. Continued disability, from same cause, from discharge to date of death is clearly established. A reasonable presumption of death from same disability obtains, and his widow is left in poverty as a consequence of his long-continued disease.

The Government is under a sacred obligation to compensate this woman for the loss of health and death of her husband and her consequent struggle with poverty.

Congress has the right to grant this relief, and it is its duty to save her from the want and anguish to which the strong arm of the President would consign her. The theory of the President seems to be that Congress should grant pensions by special act only under existing law. If relief could be had in all these cases under the present law then there would be no necessity to appeal to this body for aid.

We are not granting pensions under existing laws, but we are making new law in every case where, in the judgment of Congress, relief should be granted and can not be obtained at the Pension Office.

In this one the demand for relief is eminently just and meritorious. Therefore your committee recommend the passage of the bill, the objection of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

MRS. CATHARINE M'CARTY.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back the message of the President vetoing the bill (H. R. 5603) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine McCarty.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this report will also be printed in the RECORD, and laid over.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report to accompany bill H. R. 5603 and Executive Document 335.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States vetoing the bill (H. R. 5603) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine McCarty, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report;

The objections of the President are set forth in the message as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 5603, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine McCarty."

The beneficiary is the widow of John McCarty, of the First Missouri Regiment of State Militia Volunteers, who died at Clinton, Mo., April 8, 1864.

The widow filed her claim in 1866, alleging that her husband died while in the service from an overdose of colchicum.

The evidence shows without dispute that on the day previous to the death of the soldier a comrade procured some medicine from the regimental surgeon and asked McCarty to smell and taste it; that he did so, and shortly afterward became very sick and died the next morning.

It is quite evident that the deceased soldier did more than taste this medicine.

Although it would be pleasant to aid the widow in this case, it is hardly fair to ask the Government to grant a pension for the freak or gross heedlessness and recklessness of this soldier.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 6, 1886.

[H. R. 5603. Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine McCarty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Catherine McCarty, widow of John McCarty, late a private in Company B, First Regiment Missouri State Militia Volunteers.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the House of Representatives.
Attest: JNO. B. CLARK, JR., Clerk.

All the facts in the case are fully set forth in the following report heretofore made by this committee:

"That Catherine McCarty is the widow of John McCarty, late a private of Company B, First Missouri State Militia Volunteers, who enlisted February 5, 1862, and died at Clinton, Mo., April 8, 1864, while in the service, under the following distressing circumstances, as testified to by comrades S. Black, R. Carter, J. R. Rhoades, and W. H. Cole in the following joint affidavit:

"'Thomas Collen, a member of company, got some medicine from the surgeon and came in smelling and tasting of it, and asked John McCarty, who was nearest him, to smell and taste it, as it had a peculiar smell and taste; said McCarty did so, and shortly afterward got very sick and commenced vomiting, and died the next morning in great agony.'

"This is confirmed by records now on file in the War Department and by affidavit of J. G. Hart, late surgeon of soldier's regiment, who testifies that McCarty, while on duty in the service at Clinton, Mo., took same medicine (fluid extract of colchicum, which had been prescribed for another soldier) through a mistake, and died about thirty hours thereafter.

"His widow filed application for pension, which was rejected on the ground that 'the soldier's death was caused by his taking poison, not the result of any disease contracted in the military service.' The Pension Office, under the law, could not have done otherwise, but Congress can, and your committee believe should, recognize the fact that this woman had given her husband and the father of her children to the service of her country, and that while so serving his country he lost his life. It is true it was by a careless accident, but yet one that under the peculiar circumstances might have happened to any one.

"He served his Government faithfully for nearly two years; he left a widow with four children to fight life's battles alone; she is now old and very poor, and, in view of the services rendered by her husband, richly deserves the small recompense of a widow's pension during her few remaining years: wherefore we recommend the passage of the bill."

There is no controversy over the facts in this case. The only question at issue is whether, under the circumstances proven in this case, the widow of a soldier who died while in the service of his country of a careless accident shall be placed on the pension-roll. The President says it is hardly fair to ask the Government to grant a pension in such a case.

For the reasons set forth in the above report your committee are still of the opinion that this widow merits a place on the pension-roll, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

IMPRISONMENT OF JULIO SANTOS.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, having had under consideration the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to transmit to the House of Representatives the correspondence relating to the imprisonment in Ecuador and subsequent release of Julio Santos, a citizen of the United States"— report the same back with the recommendation that it pass.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE APPOINTMENTS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back the following resolution with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the United States Civil Service Commission be, and is hereby, directed to inform this House by what authority twenty-three appointments to positions within the classified public service were made from the District of Columbia, when the proportion due to said District of Columbia was less than three for the year ending January 16, 1886.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FURLOUGHS WITH PAY, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, also submitted the following report:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House whether or not employés in his Department are granted furloughs or leaves of absence with pay for a greater length of time than thirty days in any given twelve months; if so, by what authority of law and to what extent such custom is had"— report that they have duly considered the same, and recommend that the resolution pass.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the Clerk will now report the next amendment on which a separate vote is asked on the deficiency bill.

Mr. BRAGG. Before that is done, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it was understood if mistakes occurred in the printed names of parties inserted in the bill who had judgments against the United States they should be corrected, I wish to call the attention of the House and ask permission now to make a correction on page 65 of the bill, as follows: The name "Frank L. Lyons" should be changed to read "Frank L. Jones," and the word "administrators" should be in the singular, not in the plural.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the correction will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 72 add the following proviso:

"Provided, That satisfactory security shall be given to the Secretary of the Treasury that the said amount shall be paid to the several alien bondholders, stockholders, or their representatives, out of whose money the said taxes were paid to the Government."

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not the proviso, but the main proposition.

Mr. BURNES. The whole amendment as amended should be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 72, after the words "eighty-three," in line 35, down to and including line 40, as follows: "Except the claims numbered 46050, 47381, and 47413, contained in said Executive Document No. 70, $17,197.13," and insert "$39,020.28" and the proviso.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the paragraph be read as it will stand if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "eighty-three," in line 35, insert "$39,020.28;" so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"For refunding taxes illegally collected prior to July 1, 1883, $39,020.28: Provided, That satisfactory security shall be given to the Secretary of the Treasury that the said amount shall be paid to the several alien bondholders or stockholders or their representatives out of whose money the said taxes were paid to the Government."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the New York Evening Post a few days ago stated that I was absent intentionally on the 5th day of July when this matter was considered in the Committee of the Whole, and that a brother of mine was interested as attorney in this claim. I knew nothing about it when the matter was considered in the committee, but have since learned that he has no interest whatever, either directly or indirectly, in the matter. It would not have made any difference to me, as everybody who knows me will concede. I think, however, I have a right to say that in the committee I resisted in every way possible, as did the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], this claim, and I shall continue to do so in the House.

Mr. CANNON. Debate having been allowed on one side it may be well enough to have a statement from the other side. While the statement of the gentleman is true that he did resist this in the committee, yet it is also true he offered no reason for resisting it that I heard, nor does he offer any reason here for resisting it.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee was so nearly unanimous that it was not necessary to give any reasons. I can give the reasons now.

Mr. CANNON. You did not before. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I object to this matter being gone into further unless we are to have a full discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. Since I am invited by the gentleman from Illinois to state why I resisted this amendment, I will say it was because I do not believe it will ever reach the people who paid the money.

Mr. CANNON. I am willing there should be debate on this matter if both sides are heard. There is a fund which will reach these people.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The SPEAKER. It has been read twice or three times already.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 66, noes 73.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 108, not voting 110; as follows:
